Firestone knows that a caterer's function goes beyond preparing and serving food so he is always available to give advice on other details such as color schemes, choosing wines and selecting bands, florists or photographers. "We try to make things as easy as possible for our customers. We know how much work goes into making a simcha."

He places great importance on his customers getting good value for their money. "Apart from taxes and gratuities, the whole meal is inclusive, from the appetizer to the dessert. Only the bar and sweet table are extra. Many people assume that having a simcha at a synagogue is expensive, but it needn't be — and in most cases, it isn't." He adds, however, "Cutting corners is not in our recipe file. We use the biggest serving spoons in kosher catering."

He welcomes non-members and organizations to the synagogue and says that a recent dinner sponsored by Jerusalem College of Technology to celebrate its 25th anniversary was a great success. "The synagogue has a large, updated, comfortable banquet hall, as well as two smaller halls so we are able to accommodate every party from weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs, sports banquets, corporate and organizational events to sheva brachot."

How about a tube in Brisket Beige?

Several years ago, New Yorker Susan Krasner discovered that the lipstick her neighbors were swallowing with their sandwiches and coffee was not kosher.

Carmine red, a coloring agent used in many lipsticks, explains Rhonda Goldberg of Arisal Cosmetics, is made by drying and crushing certain insects.

Krasner decided to create an acceptable line of lipsticks, called Sunset to Sunset, which contain no animal or insect products, and are not tested on animals.

They meet purity and cleanliness standards of the Union of Orthodox Rabbis, and carry its parve certification label.

They are also kosher for Passover.

Goldberg, who has spent 20 years in the cosmetics industry, decided to import this line to Canada, under the Cinema label.

One of the beauties of Cinema lipsticks, is that some darker shades, like Dead Sea Red, Promised Land Pink, Galilee Garnet, and Sinai Sienna are so long lasting that they actually stay on from sunset to sunset, such as over Shabbat.

They are available in health and kosher food stores, Shomer Drugs, Kosher Food Warehouse, some wig establishments and certain Judaica stores.

Arisal cosmetics will donate 10 per cent from all orders to help the settlers in Israel.

Cheese Specialties... Plus

Once you have renovated your store and changed your name, what's next?

Well, for Les Rosenberg, of Boro Park on Bathurst, you definitely don't rest on your laurels. You keep adding new products and services, to best meet customers needs and wants.

Of course, the cheese continues as the hallmark line of goods at Boro Park, but recently Rosenberg has added many things unavailable in other kosher stores.

The baked goods department, in particular has grown, with many customers now insisting on only those rolls and danish baked on the premises.

The store even offers frozen dough, so customers can enjoy the fresh-baked taste of bourekas, croissants and rogelach in their own homes.

"The bake-at-home products," says Rosenberg, "caused the most instantaneous customer response. It was very dramatic. In comparison, the coffees became popular more gradually.

Boro Park has had gourmet flavored coffee beans for some time but now, you can actually sample the coffees, like cinnamon hazelnut and Italian chocolate, to be sure you are getting something you really like. The store features a flavor of the day.

The deli line has been expanded to include pickled tomatoes, olives, pickles, lox and herring.

Rosenberg never stops.

Unbelievable but true — King Solomon's Table is now celebrating its first anniversary on the Toronto Kosher scene, while Regal Kosher Caterers and The Wok 'N Deli Restaurant are well into their second year.

Catering manager Joanne Katz couldn't be more pleased at the success they have enjoyed. Pleased, but not surprised. After all, how could they miss with wonderful cuisine and terrific facilities to please any consumer?

The uniqueness of King Solomon's Table goes beyond its elegant, panelled walls, soft lighting and sophisticated background music. Its location in the Montecassino Place Hotel at Sheppard (a stone's throw from the 401 and the Allen Road) makes it easily accessible by auto or transit, and many clients have taken advantage of this accessibility for their business lunches and corporate functions.

With its own permanent Kosher kitchen on the premises, Regal Kosher Caterers supplies all the edibles that grace King Solomon's Table and the weddings, bar/bat mitzvahs, sheva brachot and other functions that take place in the hotel's elegant dining halls.

On Saturday nights and Sunday mornings/afternoons, King Solomon's Table is utilized for private fuctions. Joanne says that she "has had the pleasure of meeting so many wonderful people, and helping them plan and organize their functions."

And the food! King Solomon's is especially known for its extensive Chinese buffet, which is available for dinner and, in a slightly smaller version, at lunchtime. In fact, chef Da Zheng Wang's recipe for sesame yams was featured in Mary McGrath's column in the Star Week.

Patrons can also choose from a mouth-watering continental menu, highlighted by an extensive wine list and a truly sinful dessert selection.

The Wok 'N Deli, in Spring Farm Marketplace at Clark and Hilda in Thornhill, features the same great food, in a more relaxed, haimishe setting.

"It's ideal for picking up a phone and ordering take-out, for a nosh after a show, or for the tired housewife who can't face making another meal," Joanne says.

Regal Kosher Caterers, King Solomon's Table and Wok 'N Deli, owned by Joe Elmaleh, C.A., Rabbi A. J. Eisenberger, and Irwin Diamond, are under the supervision of the Kashruth Council, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (C.O.R.).

A Product of Quality... A Respect for Tradition...

More than just a logo, this truly is the meaning behind every Chai Kosher Poultry product. Now into its 8th year in operation, this family owned and operated plant knows of the quality consumers want and entail strict and supervised procedures to provide it.

Under the direct supervision of the Kashruth Council of Toronto (COR), its staff of 57 includes four schochtim (slaughterers) and three mashgichim (Kashruth supervisors). As well, poultry prepared under Lubavitch auspices also comes from Chai Kosher.

Chai in Quality...

Being the only kosher processing plant in Ontario Chai provides over 6,000 birds a day to the kosher market across Canada.

The diligent and caring staff, from the schochtim to the packagers, with the watchful eyes of both the veterinarian staff of the Federal Government and the highly trained mashgichim of the COR, ensure that only the best in kosher reach each table.

Chai in Taste...

The entire kosher process provides a tastier product. Only ice cold water is used during the processing of the birds as opposed to scalding hot water used in non kosher entities. This ice cold water seals in the natural juices and tenderness of the birds, whereas the hot water boils most of it out. For further koshering, the birds are soaked for a minimum of 32 minutes, salted for one hour and again soaked in ice cold water for 30 minutes to rinse off the excess salt. The process, with the dual supervision, ensures that these poultry products are 100% kosher, all year around, including Passover.

Chai in Style...

From a single package of legs or breasts, to a family pack of wings and drumsticks, Chai has it all. As well, cornish hens, stewing hens and even ducks can be found in many locations sealed with the Chai label. Products such as turkey scallopini, turkey and chicken stir-fry, turkey roasts, and most recently, ground dark and white chicken and turkey has also been added to the Chai line.

Chai delivers daily to neighbourhood chain stores, including Perl's Meats, Sunnybrook, Miracle Food Mart, Food City, Loblaws, Highland Farms, Super Centre, Price Chopper and No Frills. Many kosher butcher shops, including Joe Kirshen's. Hartman's, Kosher Meats and Treats, Hamiltion Kosher in Hamilton, United Kosher in Ottawa and Aviv Kosher Meats in Vancouver, also carry Chai products.

Chai in You...

Currently, with health conscious consumers turning frequently to healthy, low-fat food, it is comforting to know that those who keep kosher can also get high quality, conveniently packaged poultry, prepared under the highest standards of kashruth and cleanliness.

Miracle Means Fresh and Miracle Means Kosher!

Miracle Food Mart is gearing up for Passover and as always plans to offer a full assortment of kosher-for-Passover products.

Bill Sheine, vice-president of marketing for the parent company, The Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company (A&P), says that Miracle Food Mart was the first supermarket chain in Ontario to sell kosher meat and the tradition continues with fresh, high quality kosher meat for Passover. "We've always tried to meet the needs of our kosher customers."

Finest quality and selection of kosher meat

All glatt kosher fresh beef, fresh veal and fresh lamb sold by Miracle and Ultra-Mart comes from Agri Processors in Iowa. The large cuts of meat are cut to specification at Lazar Yitzchok, a federally approved glatt processing facility. It is inspected and approved by the Kashruth council of Toronto (COR 369).

Miracle's Glatt kosher meats are cut fresh under the supervision of a Mashgiach and sent daily to Miracle and Ultra-Mart stores at Viewmount & Bathurst, Bathurst & Steeles, Sheppard & Bathurst, and Don Mills & Steeles. Staff is always pleased to take personal orders for that special roast for the holidays or any other special cut desired. Ken Duff, now the seafood director, but previously assistant director of meats says that "Iowa beef costs more but we are willing to give the customers what they want."

Kosher poultry available in a variety of cuts

Kosher poultry, fresh daily under the supervision of the Kashruth Council of Toronto (COR 218) is available at the same stores in a wide variety and selection of quality poultry cuts prepared under the strictest standards of Kashruth and cleanliness. "Freshness is one of the things that differentiates us from the competition. Our motto is 'Miracle means fresh'."

This motto also applies to Miracle Food Mart's produce section, which is full of shelf after shelf of fresh domestic as well as imported fruits and vegetables. From the tropics come ugli fruit, plantain bananas, pineapples, mangoes and coconuts. Cactus pears are a treat flown in from South Africa, and from Italy come delicious blood oranges. With apple varieties such as Mutsu, Royal Gala, Granny Smith, Delicious and McIntosh, there is sure to be one to suit the apple afficionado. "We have our own produce buyers in each region from which we buy and they work primarily at the fields. With 1200 stores across North America, we have major buying power and we purchase entire fields in order to handle our requirements," says Sheine.

Introduced three years ago, the in-house Master Choice line includes a plethora of premium quality products guaranteed to excite buyers who want the very best. The line includes kosher soft drinks, chips, cookies, and sorbet-ice creams. Master Choice is sold by all A&P supermarkets in both the United States and Canada, and by Miracle, Ultra-Mart and Dominion Stores in Canada.

The people at Miracle Food Mart know that quick, kosher meals are a requirement for the busy working family and it offers prepared foods such as Chai frozen barbeque chickens, Empire pizzas, a wide range of Tabachnik soups, Perl's meat pies and Aaron's cold cuts. Even salad and stir fries are a snap with precut shredded carrots, broccoli slaw, garden salad or broccoli pieces.

Sheine says that maintaining a loyal customer base is of utmost importance at Miracle Food Mart. "Everybody wants a piece of the grocery business but they can't compete with us on variety, freshness and service."

New specialty channel draws favorable response

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Showcase Television, one of the new specialty channels, is attracting a different kind of television viewer — people who seldom turned on the tube because the kind of entertainment they want is rarely offered by more established stations.

"They're going to see television that is different from the television they didn't watch before," said Phyllis Yaffe, president and CEO of the fledgling TV station that went on air Jan. 1.

Canada's first all-fiction entertainment network, Showcase features top Canadian dramatic series and films, as well as hit television programs and international movies from everywhere except the United States.

Canadians have many opportunities to see American television and films, Yaffe explained, while programming and films from around the world have been a missing component in our TV fare.

Showcase, she said, is bringing different nationalities and cultures to the small screen.

Enthusiastic letters from viewers across Canada have been pouring into the station, praising the programming range. One man from Newfoundland, Yaffe recalled, wrote to say that he is unable to find foreign and classic films in his local video store. Now he is glued to his television set every night when Showcase presents Canadian and foreign feature films. Some of the movies in the series have been seen only by audiences at film festivals.

In keeping with its multicultural outlook, Showcase aired movies with strong Jewish content in its first few weeks of broadcasting.

They included Moise, the story of an Orthodox Montreal family, and The Dunera Boys, about Holocaust survivors living in Australia after World War II. The King of Kensington, starring Al Waxman, is shown twice daily Mondays to Fridays.

Yaffe said one of the station's top-rated shows, the critically acclaimed British detective series Spender, draws an audience of 115,000, and 126,00 people watched a recent showing of the Monty Python movie Life of Brian. "We're very confident we can build a sizable audience out of our programming mix. We're aiming for those kinds of numbers."

Advertisers have responded favorably, especially as they are able to reach a new market. Yaffe reported that Showcase already has some "core" advertising and the future looks bright. "We believe advertising will make up a large part of our business. We're really working hard on that."

If Yaffe is at all fazed by Rogers Cablesystems' recent decision to offer the specialty channels, including Showcase, as an extension of the cable package, she is not showing it. "We've had to readjust our marketing plans," she said. "We're going to have to be more aggressive."

Rogers originally planned to include the specialty channels in a cable package with established networks and announced a price hike at the end of last year. In effect the cable company was handing the new channels an audience. Under public pressure, Rogers backed down, leaving the specialty channels more vulnerable than they expected to be at the early stages of their growth.

Showcase receives 32 cents of monthly revenue for each cable subscriber. Four and a half million homes got the specialty channels free of charge until the end of February. But subscribers can now select the cable package of their choice, either with or without new channels, which could affect advertising revenues.

As a result, the station is going through its advertising budget at an accelerated pace. "Just move money up and spend it,' said Yaffe. The station currently has daily radio spots across Canada, ads in television guides and outdoor advertising.

Yaffe has been involved with Showcase almost from the beginning and has gone through the intensely competitive licensing process. The station applied to the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission (CRTC) in June 1993 and was one of 10 networks, including six English-language specialty channels, to be licensed a year later. Initially there were 68 applicants, 20 of whom were rejected because their financing was inadequate. Forty-seven made it to the hearing stage.

Robert Lantos, the head of Alliance Communications Corp. came up with the idea for the station. Bringing investors on board was relatively easy, said Yaffe, as Showcase's major shareholder, Alliance, is a strong and thriving company. Alliance has a 55 per cent interest, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation owns 20 per cent, Les Productions La Fete holds 17 per cent, while the remaining stock is held by smaller shareholders, including Yaffe.

She said Showcase is looking forward to the next year, when the station will build its audience and continue to bring quality entertainment to Canadians. "We're very confident about the future, but we certainly have a lot of work to do."

Yaffe predicts television will become a major industry in the future and should create a significant number of jobs. "There's going to be the need for many talented people" in Canadian television, she said.

Job Hunting is a monthly column dedicated to job-searching techniques by job counsellor Lisa Galet. Readers are invited to forward any questions relating to this topic to Lisa Galet, c/o The Canadian Jewish News.

In a job search, most of us spend a great deal of time writing and rewriting our resume. We believe if our resume is tailored for each job application then we make a stronger application. This is not necessarily the case.

The resume should begin with your name, address and phone number, listed at the top of the page. This is the only personal information you need. Information about your marital status, your parental status, your health or your social insurance number do not need to be on your resume. The personal information section should take up no more than the top two inches of an 8½ x 11 sheet of paper.

Next should be a line or two identifying the type of job you are looking for. This is a statement of intent and should be as general as possible. The statement emphasizes your skills and experience as opposed to your previous or hopeful job titles.

A line like "searching for an opportunity to use my clerical skills and fundraising experience" says a lot and allows the resume to be considered for any type of position requiring those skills or that experience.

Do not write you are looking for work in a progressive firm if you are not necessarily looking for work in a progressive firm. A firm that is not progressive will not consider reading your resume, even if they have an opening, if you limit yourself in this way. Also, don't tell them at this point how terrific you are. Leave that for the next section.

The next section of the resume is a summary of the highlights of your skills and experience. This section should be point form and straightforward and can run anywhere from five to seven lines long. The first line should point to your experience and support your statement of intent.

For example, for the statement above you might write "over four years fundraising experience in the public and private sectors." On the second line you would back up something else from your statement of intent: "over three years clerical experience." If you are looking for an administrative type of job, your third line might say "keyboarding speed 70-75 words per minute." You may want to add "knowledge of WordPerfect 5.1, Lotus 1-2-3 and DOS" as your fourth line and "capable of working well under pressure" as your fifth line.

The purpose of the summary section is to give the resume reader a quick picture of you. A first reading is usually only about 10 seconds long, or about the time it takes to read the personal information section, the statement of intent and the summary section. After reading this far, hopefully, your resume has caught the reader's eye and will be read to the end.

Tips from The Pros

By PETER BROWNING
Special to The CJN

Most Canadians heaved a sigh of relief on federal budget day; the government's attention was focused on spending cuts, taxing large corporations and closing loopholes for high income earners.

Here are the most significant changes affecting individuals and entrepreneurs and some ideas for using them to your best advantage:

• RRSP contribution limits won't reach the scheduled 1996 maximum of $15,500 until 1999. This year you can contribute $14,500, but you will have to reduce that to $13,500 for 1996 and 1997. As well, the $8,000 overcontribution limit has been lowered to $2,000, but if you have already made that overcontribution, you won't pay a penalty.

• As of July 1996, those with incomes of $53,215 who receive Old Age Security will receive smaller cheques. The benefit will not be taxed back later. As well, if you are no longer resident in Canada, you must file a statement of your worldwide income in order to continue receiving these benefits.

• Discretionary family trusts may still be used for income-splitting purposes, but the preferred beneficiary election has been eliminated for taxation years starting after 1995. To achieve income-splitting benefits after 1995, you will have to pay the income to the beneficiaries or pay on their behalf.

• The 21-year deemed disposition rule for trusts has been reintroduced as of Jan. 1, 1999. This means that trusts are deemed to dispose of capital properties at their fair market value every 21 years and must recognize the resulting capital gains which are then subject to tax. This will limit the use of trusts to defer capital gains at death beyond a single generation.

Budget Analysis

• All sole proprietors, professional corporations and partnerships are now required to have fiscal year ends of Dec. 31. This means higher tax bills for the next decade and more paperwork this year for those with non-calendar year ends. You will need financial information for your regular year end as well as for the period between it and Dec. 31.

Preliminary changes to the research and development tax incentive program will affect many small businesses. These include limiting incentives for contract R&D payments to separate companies and to certain third parties, and requiring payments for R&D to be paid within 180 days of the year end to qualify.

• Canadian films will no longer be attractive investments for limited partner investors. After 1995, prescribed revenue guarantees will reduce the tax benefits. Owners of film and video production companies should investigate other financing options, and investors should check out other tax shelters, including non-Canadian films.

• As the government cracks down on the underground economy, those in the construction business must report all payments to sub-contractors after 1995.

• Business owners involved in offshore investments structured through trusts should prepare for an audit-type review by Revenue Canada. For taxation years after 1995 trusts must submit an annual return with financial statements, and information on contributions and distribution. Additional reporting is also required for shareholders in offshore companies.

Finally — don't be late or deficient with your tax payments. Interest penalties have been increased by two per cent. After July 1, your tax bill could be as much as 10 per cent higher if you don't pay on time.

Disneys Buy Into Koor Industries

JERUSALEM — The U.S. Shamrock Group, an investment firm controlled by the Disney family, has signed an agreement in principle to buy Hevrat Ha'ovdim's 22.51 per cent share in Koor Industries for $252 million, the group announced last week.

The price is about 20 per cent higher than the shares' average market value since the start of the year. The agreement was reached after five months of intensive negotiations with several investment groups.

Following the announcement, Koor's shares jumped 5.75 per cent on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange on very high turnover of about NIS 6 million. Shares related to the Koor group also increased sharply on high turnovers.

Proceeds of the sale will be used to cover part of the Histadrut's NIS 1 billion deficit.

Israeli Trade Deficit Doubles

JERUSALEM — Israel's trade deficit doubled last year, from $1.37 billion (US) in 1993 to $2.76 billion in 1994, the Central Bureau of Statistics announced.

Imports of goods and services increased by some $3.6 billion during the period, the bureau said. The significant worsening of the trade balance was said to have been due to a large increase in the purchases of consumer products by Israelis.

Martin Daniel Interiors

By RUTH SCHWEITZER

TORONTO — Nick Simone used to be a schoolteacher, but he always dreamed of starting a business.

Nine years ago his dream became a reality when he, his brother Angelo, and his sister-in-law Ginette opened Martin Daniel Interiors, a fine furniture showroom which offers Italian imports.

"We bring in exclusive lines of contemporary classic furniture, lines not available anywhere else," said Simone. Some of the furniture designed specially for Martin Daniel is made in small Italian factories by artisans.

He said the store favors Italian furniture because it is made from superior woods and is known for its finely executed quality and detailing.

Martin Daniel was the first store in Canada to introduce the Giorgio collection, a grouping of uniquely designed furniture made of exotic woods such as mahogany and python (similar to Brazilian walnut).

The Giorgio dining room suite is made with inlaid wood and the bedroom set combines leather, lacquers and a light wood to create an unusual effect. The collection is ideal for someone "who is looking for something different," said Simone. Yet he stressed that the furniture has a classic look that will never go out of style.

Furniture trends are moving away from the coolness of high tech, he said, to the elegance of a contemporary look with a traditional "classic" feeling.

Some of the newest pieces in the Martin Daniel showroom feature lacquers in combination with exotic woods like mahoganies or with lighter woods such as sycamore and walnut.

For the first time since it opened, the store has changed dramatically, said Simone. "It has become a lot softer with a classic influence, which reflects the trends in home decor."

This transition coincides with the recent arrival of furniture from this year's Milano furniture exhibition. "We've never had this much new product at one time," he says.

Simone and his partners follow the color trends in Italy, so upholstery in the showroom is bright and lively. Accessories include hand-blown Murano glass vases in vibrant colors and fine ceramics.

Angelo, Nick's brother, is the buyer for Martin Daniel, travelling to Italy in search of new products and new ideas at least twice a year, and attending U.S. furniture shows.

The interior designer in the family is Ginette, Angelo's wife. She is responsible for the showroom's striking displays. "We really pay a lot of attention to how the showroom looks," said Nick Simone, who is in charge of the store's day-to-day operations.

"We try to create settings so that the customer can visualize how the furniture will look in his or her home. Each setting is coordinated with proper colors, artwork and accessories to match."

Martin Daniel has a complimentary interior design service — a staff designer available to go to customers' home to take measurements, to discuss their requirements and to give them design advice. The service is available for a single room or an entire home.

The salespeople at the showroom do not work on commission, which means they can spend time with customers who are shopping for accessories as well as those looking at big-ticket items.

"If you offer a person good service for $50, they will remember you and come back," said Simone. He added that in the course of a year the store does very well with accessories.

Simone said 1994 has been the best year ever for Martin Daniel. The recession has hardly affected business, he says, since the store carries only high end products and caters to a business and professional clientele.

Whistler is a world-class resort right in Canada

By MARTY WAGMAN
Special to The CJN

WHISTLER, B.C. — You can experience a world class ski resort here in Canada, with adventure, shopping, excitement and fine dining in one of the most beautiful mountain settings anywhere.

Whistler offers an abundance of activities. The resort has two distinct, separately owned ski areas — Blackcomb and Whistler.

Blackcomb has six high-speed quad chairlifts, three triple chairlifts, two glacier T-bars and an outstanding eight-passenger high speed gondola.

The mountain has a vertical rise of 5,280 feet, the highest in North America. (In comparison, Vail, Colo. has a vertical rise of 3,250 feet.) There are more than 100 runs.

Whistler has four high-speed quad chairlifts, three triple chairlifts, one double chairlift, one Alpine T-bar and a 10-passenger high speed gondola. Whistler's vertical rise is 5,020 feet, with more than 100 marked runs and seven Alpine bowls.

The magnificent Blackcomb glacier is an immense area that offers something for skiers at all levels. The far side has a gentle slope, while the middle allows for major cruising and the downhill has a steep pitch sometimes enhanced by moguls.

You can try the 40 degree Blow Hole, a steep, avoidable double black diamond section. The Blackcomb glacier alone is the same size as some major North American resorts.

Seventh Heaven, with a vertical rise of 1,932 feet, has above-the-tree line skiing. On sunny days, this sun drenched area is well named.

Blackcomb offers well-groomed, magnificent intermediate and easy skiing and big, long, well-marked cruising.

Whistler is just next door to Blackcomb and offers its own adventures. Ride up the Peak Chair and enjoy the incredible view.

There are many choices of challenging runs and great bowl skiing. The new Harmony Express will whisk you to the top of Little Whistler for a variety of terrain choices.

The ski season is long at these two resorts. Blackcomb opened Nov. 11 this season and will close May 22. Whistler's last day is April 23.

For package deals Skican has well organized trips 416-488-1169 or try Air Canada Vacations through your travel agent.

During the summer, Whistler's delights include dining al fresco, mountain-biking, golf, glacier skiing and other organized events.

Travel Talk

by Bill Gladstone

Numerous readers of Travel Talk who return from Caribbean cruises have told me of an interesting discovery they make after their cruise ship docks at Curacao, the little stringbean-shaped Caribbean isle some 63 kilometres from Venezuela.

A rugged and hilly outcropping, Curacao is home to about 160,000 inhabitants. Although most are Catholic, they represent about 80 nationalities and speak four languages: English, Dutch, Spanish and Papiamento, the local dialect. Curacaoans are proud of the island's small but prominent Jewish population of about 600, whose ancestors found sanctuary here in the centuries after the Spanish and Portuguese expulsions.

The first Jews arrived here early in the 17th century, and founded the Mikve-Israel Congregation in 1651. Today the island's Jews are custodians of the elegant Mikve-Israel Emmanuel Synagogue, which is in its fourth building and dates from 1732, and is reputed to be the oldest surviving synagogue in the New World.

A traditional Sephardi structure, Mikve-Israel Emmanuel retains a sandy floor, for which two explanations are offered. The first is that the sand is reminiscent of the wanderings of the Children of Israel through the desert. The second is that the sand was used in post-exile Spain to help muffle the sounds of prayer when any form of Jewish worship was a crime punishable by torture or death.

A major tourist attraction, Mikve-Israel Emmanuel receives some 15,000 visitors per year. Services are still occasionally conducted there. (A minyan meets regularly at an Orthodox shul in the suburbs.)

The synagogue is one of many worthwhile attractions in Willemstad, the capital of Curacao. Visitors will be easily won over by Willemstad's fine Dutch colonial architecture. A longstanding government edict prohibiting white buildings is still loyally followed. Most walls are bright creamy yellow or orange, including those of the synagogue.

Willemstad's century-old Queen Emma floating bridge links the Punda and Ostrabunda neighborhoods. Formerly only the barefooted were exempted from paying the toll but today everyone may cross for free. Nearby is the so-called "floating market," a row of ships that arrive every morning from Venezuela with fresh fruits and vegetables for sale.

After exploring Willemstad, visitors may wish to see the Seaquarium, where thousands of brightly colored fish are displayed. There are several old forts located around the island, including Fort Nassau, which offers a good restaurant and a breathtaking view. Fort Amsterdam houses the Governor's Palace and a Dutch Reformed Church.

Plantation landhouses dot the island, most of them elegant old mansions that overlook vast estates. They provide a strong contrast to the pitiful cement huts that once housed the slaves who worked the plantations. There was an important slave revolt here in 1795, six years after the French Revolution that probably inspired it, but emancipation did not come to the island until 1863.

Languishing in tropical heat, refreshed by constant tradewinds, Curacao is in many ways a study of contrasts. Despite high unemployment, there are about 50,000 cars on the island, one for almost every three people. And on this island where one old-fashioned thatched-roof hut still stands, the government and private interests joined together several years ago to build a $20-million ultra modern convention facility.

The largest of the five islands that comprise the Netherland Antilles, Curacao must compete for tourists with its sister island Aruba. Tourism officials concede that Aruba has finer beaches but argue that Curacao's rich history and variety of attractions make it the place with "something for everyone." They hope that cruise ship passengers who spend an afternoon here, including readers of this column, will return for stays of longer duration.

A hockey fan's guide to touring Miami the Canadian way, eh!

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

MIAMI — Ah, Florida. Land of palm trees, golf courses, the Rascal House, six-inch high lemon meringue pie, sandy beaches and ice hockey. Yes, hockey, and two or three times a week no less.

Canadians who've shoehorned themselves into Maple Leaf Gardens or prostrated themselves before that shrine of hockey, the Montreal Forum, shouldn't crinkle their noses at the thought of enjoying the great Canadian experience down in the Sunshine State.

Snowbirds visiting the Miami area can head from poolside to rinkside and enjoy a transplanted piece of Canadian culture.

The Miami Arena is the home of the Panthers, south Florida's NHL franchise that entered the league a year and a half ago. With a lineup of castoffs and up-and-comers coached by Roger Neilson, the Panthers employ the neutral zone snore-a-thon designed to bore the opposition into giving up bad goals. Nevertheless, a recent game and the accompanying hoopla left this hockey junkie a satisfied customer.

The Tickets

Panthers tickets are available through Ticketmaster. The cheap seats, equivalent to Maple Leaf Gardens grays, are no bargains, running at $30 US. That's each. But determined to catch a game, I was in a Ticketmaster lineup in a Hallandale drugstore when it opened at 10 a.m. on game day.

There's a saying that God looks out for orphans and Snowbird hockey fans, and much to my surprise, I learned that on the day of the game, the team makes available "Panther Pack" tickets in the top three rows for only about $10 US. Glad to do business with you, I said as I pocketed the suddenly affordable ducats.

The Ride From Hell

The Miami Arena, I was told by several experienced Florida vacationers who watch the nightly news, is in a part of town you don't want to visit unless you've already made out your will.

But Panthers' management, who also watch the news, came to the rescue. The team provides shuttle buses and vans from various outlying shopping malls to deliver fans to the front doors of the arena and pick them up there right after. Cost is $10.

The Fans

Unlike a game in Canada, where the crowd is about 75 per cent male (based on my experience in five NHL rinks), the fans in Florida were split about 50-50 along gender lines and were generally quite youthful. Hockey is currently an in sport and many fans wore Panthers sweaters (and shorts) to the game.

The Game

The Hartford Whalers were in town to tackle the Cats and they put on a pretty good show, though Whalers' backstop Jeff Reese played like a sieve and cost his team the game, won by Florida 4-3.

The Hoopla

Florida fans were treated to all sorts of pre-game and between period hijinks. Two young people used elastic slingshots to fling souvenirs into the appreciative crowd; between periods various contests were held where fans tried to throw footballs into rings, shoot baskets and fire pucks into nets. There was even an on-ice tricycle race between fans from outlying communities.

Meanwhile a blimp maneuvered in the air above the crowd, occasionally dropping what looked to be prize vouchers. And of course before the game, the lights were turned down low, menacing music was piped through the sound system and the Panthers skated onto the ice through the jaws of a cut-out big cat in a haze of smoke.

Stepchild On The Vistula, by S. Simchovitch (Lugus Publishing, 12.50).

What was it like to grow up in Otwoch, a small city 28 kilometres south of Warsaw, during the two decades prior to the outbreak of World War II? How did poor and oppressed Jews eke out a livelihood? What were the conflicting concerns and feelings of a sensitive, thoughtful Jewish boy? How did the various political, Zionist and social movements compete for Jewish loyalty? What was the relationship between Jews and their Polish neighbors?

These are some of the questions the author answers in this evocative book, a bittersweet work of reminiscence from his own earlier years.

Nohum Freidowicz, the son of a pious bootmaker and restaurant owner, excels in his religious studies, but is sent to a Polish school to improve his chances of earning a livelihood. "At home, on the streets and courtyards of the Jewish quarter around the bazaar, the children lived and breathed their indigenous Jewish language and culture which become taboo as soon as they entered the school premises. Here, every subject was taught in Polish, the songs, plays, and celebrations — all in Polish.

A vortex of political activity

"Whenever Pani Pola heard a Yiddish word from one of her pupils, she became angry and dismayed. 'What do I hear?' she would exclaim in a pitched voice. 'Again the ugly jargon? Here is not a Heder, here is a Polish government school!' "

As a naive teenager, Nohum is swept into a vortex of political activity. Idealists filled with revolutionary fervor urge young Jews to cast aside the shackles of Polish oppression. One day Nohum leads his fellow classmates in a Protest Day strike against anti-Semitism. He gradually neglects Orthodox observance and flirts with communism. Apprehended by the police at 15 for distributing prohibited literature, he spends a brief, harsh time in jail before he is released to the custody of his relieved father.

Disillusioned with communism, he joins the Bund — an organization that defended Jewish rights, opposed Zionism and maintained that Jews had a place and a future in a democratic Poland.

The protagonist is 18 when the Germans invade Poland, and the novel ends as he boards a train that will take him to the Ukraine.

The author tells this story in a straightforward fashion, with a poet's eye for telling detail and with vignettes of believable characters — family members, colorful teachers, cronies and fervent radicals.

The reader is quickly caught up in this nostalgic chronicle of a boy's quest for self-understanding and fulfilment, against a rich tapestry of ferment and folklore.

Stepchild on the Vistula was published in Yiddish in 1992 to widespread acclaim. Simcha Simchovitch, a well known Toronto poet and former teacher of Hebrew, is the recipient of the J.I. Segal Prize and other literary awards from the Toronto Jewish Community.

In his introduction to the book, the author reveals that in 1942, the Nazis rounded up and sent 8,000 Jews of Otwoch to their death in Treblinka. An additional 4,000 were shot and buried in several mass graves in the city.

This paperbound book is available in Jewish bookstores in Toronto.

Eye on Arts

By Bill Gladstone

New Edition of Anne Frank: Written by a teenaged girl while in hiding from the Nazis in Amsterdam, The Diary of Anne Frank remains "the single most compelling personal account of the Holocaust," as the New York Times recently put it.

Half a century after Anne Frank died in the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp, the American publishing house Doubleday has published a new "definitive edition" of her famous diary, which she filled with entries to an imaginary girlfriend, Kitty.

Evidently Anne's father, Otto Frank — the only survivor of the eight people hidden in the now-famous secret annex for two years — had trimmed much material from the diary upon its initial publication because of space limitations and his own sense of discretion.

"The restored entries, constituting, according to the publisher, 30 per cent more material, do not alter our basic sense of Anne Frank, but they do give greater texture and nuance — and punch — to some of the hallmark concerns of the diary," the New York Times observed. The new material also contains sketches for some short stories that Anne was contemplating while in hiding.

New Diary Of Anne Frank has 30 per cent more material.

Media Watch: The late and lamented writer Isaac Bashevis Singer, who wrote all of his brilliant stories and novels in his native Yiddish, gave a memorable reply when someone once asked him why he persisted in writing in what the questioner perceived to be a dying language. "Yiddish has been dying for 300 years," Singer reportedly replied.

This month, the Canadian magazine Saturday Night contains a long, rambling think-piece by George Jonas called The End of Jewry? which purports that Jewish continuity in the West (defined as the United States, Canada and Britain) is "threatened with extinction by our open, secular and multicultural communities in which assimilation is encouraged, while discrimination is forbidden by law and frowned upon by social custom."

How odd that someone would consider tolerance itself to be a foe of the Jewish people! In short, Jonas suggests that Jewish identity is strengthened by tyrants like Hamas or Hitler, and that the Jew becomes an endangered species with nothing to define himself by in the absence of an intolerant milieu.

The inescapable implication of this article is that Judaism lacks a single compelling element of its own, and that the only thing that keeps the Jews from vanishing from the Earth is external persecution and tribal stigmatization — "Jewish mothers throwing fits and Jewish fathers heaping ashes on their heads when faced with sons or daughters attempting to marry outside the community."

A self-defined secular Jew, Jonas' article is filled with sociological observations and statistics, even an uncontextualized quote from Spinoza for added authentification. The author unabashedly admits he has little knowledge of Jewish lore or history. Funny, then, that he would agonize at all over the problem of Jewish assimilation: what's it to him? My opinion is that the piece is valuable because it demonstrates how thoroughly the Jewish people can be misrepresented and misunderstood, even by seemingly sympathetic outsiders.

In Brief: A Celebration of Student Work showcases the work of nearly 800 students, aged three to 83, at the Avenue Road Arts School, 460 Avenue Rd., Toronto. Public welcome, March 25 and 26, 1 to 5 p.m.

Falsettos, the hip Broadway hit by William Finn and James Lapine, opens at the Tarragon Theatre, Toronto, on June 29. Director is Brian Kremen and musical director is Phyllis Cohen.

Human Edge: The Lapirovs Go West is an 80-minute documentary by French director Jean-Luc Leon chronicling the odyssey of a Russian-Jewish family that moves from Moscow to Los Angeles. TVO, April 12 at 10 p.m.

Get Thee Out! is a powerful 1991 Russian film about Motl, a turn-of-the-century Jew forced to deal with an outbreak of anti-Semitism in his previously peaceful town. It's being screened by the Toronto Jewish Film Society and Cinematheque Ontario at the Art Gallery of Ontario's Jackman Hall, March 19 at 7.30 p.m. Tickets go on sale at 7 p.m.

Closer To The Sun, Garth Drabinsky's long-awaited autobiography written with Marq de Villiers, is expected in bookstores March 30. Weighing in at more than 500 pages, it's published by McClelland and Stewart and costs $35.

Poems cover wide range of subjects

Someone Else's Memoirs, by Ron Charach (Quarry Press, paper).

The Naked Physician, edited by Ron Charach (Quarry Press, $14.95, paper).

Ron Charach is a Toronto psychiatrist, as well as an accomplished, much published poet. Someone Else's Memoirs covers a wide range of subject matter — always with depth and sensitivity and with an experienced physician's response to human needs and concerns.

The poems in The Naked Physician — a remarkable anthology of the works of some 35 Canadian doctors — are in turn, moving, revealing, honest, surprising — and often humorous.

Both books contain material of Jewish interest and will be cherished by poetry afficionados. Even non-enthusiasts will be rewarded and edified.

11-year-old a pinball wizard

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

You can see and feel Daniel Brenner in Tommy.

TORONTO — He lost the coin toss to play young Tommy on opening night of the big musical, but otherwise everything is coming up roses for 11-year-old Daniel Brenner, who alternates in the role.

The Grade 6 student at Willowbrook Public School in Thornhill, son of Sherry and Laurence Brenner, sings the famous "See Me, Feel Me" lyrics in Act II. He had only half an hour to prepare the music with the pianist daughter of a neighbor, before going in to the audition.

He had seen a video of Tommy, but didn't like the music.

He'll play the 10-year-old Tommy four shows a week, alternating with Mark Zador, but has to be at the theatre every night and at matinees, just in case. Though he was excused from school during rehearsals and was tutored on the set, now that the show has opened, he has to attend school all day like any other student. But as far as he is concerned, that's a breeze.

The young Tommy sings in the choir at Richmond Hill Hebrew School, and after taking courses at the Leah Posluns Theatre School, got his first major role in 1992 as the juvenile lead in Another Kind of Hero, a play about Raoul Wallenberg. He was the youngster sitting on the roof and looking at the stars through a telescope. He had auditioned for the role on a dare. He also played a young villager in Fiddler on the Roof.

At home, his 8-year-old sister, Carly, a Grade 3 student, also loves music and can't wait to follow her brother onto the stage.

"I don't know where they get their talent from. Neither my husband nor I have ever been involved in theatre," said his mother, a medical secretary. Daniel's father is a jeweller.

Among his fans at a preview were Daniel's grandparents, Pauline and Bernard Pont of Toronto. His other grandparents, Jean and Abe Brenner, of Leeds, England, are kvelling long distance.

Films look at East Europe Jewry

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Jewish life in Eastern Europe, past and present, is examined through four films to be screened shortly.

The films, to be shown at the Art Gallery of Ontario's Jackman Hall under the auspices of Cinematheque Ontario, are The Last Klezmer, Our Children, Through Tears and Get Thee Out.

The most impressive of the lot is Yale Strom's documentary The Last Klezmer, which turns on a Polish Jew named Leopold Kozlowski. Two screenings are scheduled for March 21 at 6:30 p.m. and 8:45 p.m.

Kozlowski is a musician and a tireless promotor of klezmer music, which has all but disappeared in post-Holocaust Eastern Europe.

Strom's film is an engaging portrait of a man whose experiences mirror those of many of his contemporaries. Kozlowski was born in a town near Lvov. During the German occupation, he survived as a partisan in a forest, while his parents and brother were murdered by the Nazis.

After the war, he settled in Krakow, changed his surname from Kleinman and found employment as the director of a Polish army musical ensemble. In 1968, during the officially-orchestrated anti-Semitic campaign, he was summarily fired. Bouncing back, he joined a gypsy ensemble, then the Warsaw-based Yiddish State Theatre.

With some success, Kozlowski has tried to pass on the Polish Yiddish musical tradition to his Catholic pupils. But The Last Klezmer is not really about Kozlowski the conductor, the pianist, the violinist and the teacher. It's about his Jewish past and the lamentable condition of Jewish culture in present-day Poland.

Accompanied by Strom, Kozlowski makes a sentimental journey to the place of his birth — visiting his old home and the woods where his father was shot and where he, Kozlowski, fought as a partisan.

Along the way, in emotional encounters, he meets a friend he hasn't seen in decades and the somewhat forgetful daughter of his first piano teacher.

Despite the merry aura of Yiddishkeit he exudes, Kozlowski is ambivalent about his Jewishness. And he sees no reason why, at age 70, he should leave Poland and make aliyah.

Our Children, a Yiddish film, was made in Poland in 1948 by the Communist government, but never released. It will be shown on March 19 at 3:30 p.m.

Starring Shimon Dzigan and Yisroel Shumacher, it was one of the first films after the war to grapple with the Holocaust.

Largely filmed in a Jewish orphanage and school near Lodz, it turns on the effects of the Holocaust on children. Quite clinically, they recall the roundups, German subterfuge, the kindness of those Poles who hid children and the impassive reaction of Polish peasants to Nazi cruelty.

Normally comic actors, Dzigan and Shumacher seem rather out of their depth in this serious-minded film. Indeed, their sketches seem clumsy and mediocre. It is the children who shine.

Through Tears, a silent Soviet film with subtitles released in 1928, is based on a collection of Sholom Aleichem stories. Its themes are the family, tradition, economic hardship and anti-Semitism.

The actors, from the Moscow Art Theatre, try hard to recreate the ambience of the shtetl in the Pale of the Settlement. Though dated, Through Tears is an interesting curiosity.

Get Thee Out, one of the first Jewish-themed films during the Gorbachev era in the former Soviet Union, was previously shown at the Toronto International Film Festival. It will be screened on March 19 at 7:30 p.m.

Set in a quaint Russian village, it revolves around a Jewish family at the turn of the century forced to cope with racism and a pogrom. Dmitri Astrakhan's feature is quite moving at times.

Vatican and UK to boycott Jerusalem 3000

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Festivities to mark the 3,000th anniversary of the Jewish presence in Jerusalem are quickly turning sour.

Over the weekend, the Vatican and Great Britain announced they intend to boycott Jerusalem 3000, the series of cultural events and exhibitions taking place over 1996.

The move is in response to a recommendation made last year by the European Council not to support the festivities, Jerusalem 3000 director Yossi Tal-Gan said last week.

Most nations, including Canada, do not recognize Jerusalem as Israel's capital and regard the city's eastern portion as occupied territory captured from Jordan in the Six Day War.

Foreign Ministry officials confirmed that embassies in Europe have encountered opposition to the festivities, which will mark 3,000 years since Jerusalem became King David's capital.

"I regret very much that we have run into cool reactions from several elements in Europe, from the Vatican, and even in the United States," Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin told Israel Radio.

U.S. Vice-President Al Gore, who is slated to visit Jerusalem this week, is said to be reluctant to accept an Israeli request to head the honorary committee organizing Jerusalem 3000 events.

Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert said the opposition is "misguided."

"We recognize that most of the world does not recognize Israeli rule in Jerusalem, but this is not the issue," he said.

"We are talking about a celebration of a historic fact, not about making any kind of political statement," Tal-Gan said.

The 15-month-long celebrations are scheduled to begin in September.

IRB Israeli 'refugee' numbers soared in 1994

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Despite on-going efforts by Jerusalem to convince Ottawa there's no such thing as an Israeli refugee, Canada's Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) last year accepted more refugees from Israel than in the previous five years combined.

According to figures released last week, the IRB in 1994 granted refugee status to 380 claimants from Israel, the vast majority, community leaders agree, originally from the former Soviet Union.

A further 504 claimants from Israel were denied refugee status, and 93 claims were abandoned or withdrawn.

Last year's numbers reveal several new trends in claims from Israel. While the number of those granted asylum has increased, the number of initiated claims was down sharply over 1993. So while there were fewer claimants, more of them were accepted.

Indeed, Canada's acceptance rate of refugees from Israel skyrocketed last year to 55 per cent of claimants, compared to eight per cent the previous year and 10 per cent in 1992.

Israel will likely look askance at the numbers, as the whole issue of Canadian acceptance of refugees from Israel has been a sore point between the two nations ever since the floodgates of Soviet emigration opened in 1989.

The issue boiled over last summer, when Israel publicly called on Canada to stop accepting the claimants, arguing that

"Judy, the State of Israel salutes you," Rabin wrote.

Against the wishes of his government, Sugihara, Japan's war-time consul general in Kovno, Lithuania, signed thousands of exit visas for Jews fleeing Nazi Europe.

The award will be given to a student or groups of young people in the greater Toronto area "for extraordinary work in the area of anti-racism, or for an outstanding act or acts of humanitarianism."

The winner(s) will be announced on Dec. 10, International Human Rights Day. A brochure with the award criteria will be sent to all schools.

ISRAEL

Agreements Signed

JERUSALEM — Israel last week signed cooperative health agreements with the former Soviet republics of Azerbaijan and Turkmenistan.

The agreements regulate exchanges of medical information and experts and will enable Israeli manufacturers to operate in the two countries.

The accords also call for the setting up in both countries of medical centres that will use the latest Israeli medical advances.

Christians Study

JERUSALEM — Nineteen priests and one nun were among 21 students from the Pontifical Biblical Institute in Rome who recently completed a semester at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

The cooperative program between the two institutions was initiated over 20 years ago.

The students, who are preparing to become Bible teachers at seminaries or universities around the world, came to Hebrew U's Rothberg School for Overseas Students as part of their four-year program. Their studies included the Jewish roots of Christianity

Shopping Babayit

JERUSALEM — Israel's first TV home shopping network is scheduled to go on the air within six months.

Tuvia Saar, the joint-managing director of the group, said the network would bring Israeli consumers into a new era.

"Instead of hurtling into traffic jams and fighting for parking places, you can sit at home, watch the TV messages and just make a phone call."

WORLD

Righteous Received

BRUSSELS — King Albert II of Belgium last week received a delegation of 20 non-Jewish Belgians who helped save Jews from the Nazis during World War II. All have been named Righteous Among the Nations by Yad Vashem.

The ceremony came on the eve of a visit to the site of Auschwitz by Belgian officials, including members of the country's federal and regional governments, leaders of political parties, religious and military officials, and representatives of the Jewish community.

New Hate Law

BRUSSELS — New legislation in Belgium making Holocaust denial a criminal offense went into effect last week.

Under the new law, violators may be jailed for up to one year and fined a maximum of $40,000.

Belgium had been one of the few Western European countries where the publication of revisionist literature was not a crime.

Rabbi Bernstein Dies

NEW YORK — Modern Orthodox leader Rabbi Louis Bernstein, a three-term president of the 1,000-member Rabbinical Council of America, died in his Queens home March 12 of brain cancer. He was 67.

Rabbi Bernstein, known for his outreach to the broader Jewish community, was a Yeshiva University professor and member of the board of governors of the Jewish Agency.

Yentl, Part II?

LONDON — Barbra Streisand is contemplating making a film about Rabbi Shmuel Boteach, the leader of the Jewish students' society at Oxford University, and his friendship with Corey Booker, a young black Christian who became co-president of Oxford's L'Chaim society.

The society broke with Lubavitch last year because Rabbi Boteach was seen as too nonconformist. The group had planned to co-sponsor a visit by Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, whose stance on territorial compromise is opposed by Lubavitch.

Rabbi Boteach described Streisand as "one of the nicest and most humble people I've met, and proud of her Jewish identity."

He added that if the film is made, "I want to be played by Tom Cruise or Arnold Schwarzenegger."

Agunah vigil fights for women's rights

Denying a get amounts to spousal abuse, says rabbi

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Men who refuse their wives a Jewish divorce were equated to rapists and violent husbands by a local Orthodox rabbi speaking at Toronto's second annual Vigil for Agunot.

It was held last Tuesday evening, the eve of the Fast of Esther, in the lobby of the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC).

"When a husband refuses to give his wife a get (Jewish divorce), that is a form of spouse abuse no different than if he hits or rapes her or abuses her emotionally," said Rabbi Mark Dratch of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

Such behavior is also "an abuse of Torah and tradition," said the rabbi. A husband who refuses to give his wife a get is in violation of Jewish law and is manipulating the system, he added.

Rabbi Dratch said he was embarrassed that there weren't more men among the crowd of 70 people who gathered to show their support for agunot (women whose estranged husbands have refused them a Jewish divorce).

David Smor, a tall, grey-haired man bearing a placard, said that his wife brought the issue to his attention. He attended the vigil with her to show his solidarity, he said.

Rabbi Dratch, apparently the only rabbi in attendance, emphasized that the rabbis of the community are "deeply concerned" about the issue and have been addressing it at numerous rabbinical meetings and discussions.

In 1993, the Rabbinical Council of America, an association of Orthodox rabbis in North America, introduced a prenuptial agreement to be used by its members, Rabbi Dratch noted. The agreement was designed to ensure participation in the get process should the marriage not work out.

"It is important to share this information with our daughters, granddaughters, sisters and friends getting married," said the rabbi. "G-d willing marriages will last a long time...but those that do not

IMPORTANT LEGAL FACTS FOR AGUNOT

- Without a get (Jewish divorce issued by the rabbinical court), a woman cannot remarry under Jewish law. Should she remarry under civil law without a get, children of the subsequent marriage are considered mamzerim (illegitimate) and may only marry another mamzer or a convert under Jewish law.
- Section 21.1 of Canada's Divorce Act, amended in 1990, can be helpful to agunot. The Ontario Family Law Act has specific provisions regarding property rights which may be helpful in cases involving agunot.
- Under federal law, divorcing spouses must remove all barriers to religious remarriage of their spouse before receiving a civil divorce. In cases of non-compliance, judges can impose sanctions.
- Limitations of the law include the fact that it applies only to couples who have not yet obtained a civil divorce.

CORRECTION

It was a mistake worthy of Purim!!! Readers last week undoubtedly noticed that the identities of Ambassador Itzhak Shelef of Israel and Ambassador Mahmoud Farghal of Egypt had been switched. We humbly apologize for the error. We deeply regret any confusion or embarrassment this may have caused.

Kosher Japanese dinner raises $12,000 for Kobe shul

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — More than $12,000 was raised at a kosher Japanese dinner here on March 9 to help repair the Ohel Shlomo synagogue in Kobe, Japan, which was damaged by the recent earthquake.

The dinner was organized by Kobe expatriate Ruth Erlichman, who moved to Canada with her family in 1975, when she was 18. It was held in the Tama Sushi restaurant, which brought in special food and utensils from New York for the occasion. The restaurant donated the premises and food.

Erlichman told The CJN in a phone interivew that 105 people attended the dinner, about 75 per cent of them Jewish. They came from all streams of the community, including Lubavitchers. Many who attended had a Kobe connection as there are a number of former Kobe Jews living in Vancouver.

Erlichman, who was in Kobe last June on a business trip, resumed her friendship with many of her acquaintances and stayed at the home of the president of the shul. When news of the earthquake broke this year, she managed to get through by phone to friends who told her the shul had suffered damage estimated at $50,000 (US) and the tablets with the Ten Commandments had been shattered.

Erlichman had set a goal of $10,000 for the dinner and was delighted that more was raised. Air Canada donated a ticket so that she could take the cheque to Kobe personally; but she decided to auction the ticket and add the winning bid of $1,300 to the proceeds.

All the funds raised will be forwarded to Kobe through the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver, which cooperated in the arrangements.

Erlichman said the San Francisco B'nai Brith has contributed $18,000 to the shul and she hopes other organizations will help.

Erlichman's grandfather, Ezra Mattuck, was one of the founders of Ohel Shlomo and its first president. He had escaped from Iraq to Shanghai and then to Japan, where he operated an import-export business. Her father, who carried on the business, met his wife in Bombay and the children were all born and raised in Kobe.

Although her parents were in Japan during World War II, she said they were moved by Japanese authorities to a rural area where they were safe from military action.

"Relations with the authorities were excellent," she said. "My parents weren't prisoners."

Kobe at one time had about 300 Jewish families, mostly from Sephardi countries, but some came from Lithuania and Poland. Built in 1970, the shul is one of only two synagogues in Japan and now has 30 families (75 people). It holds Shabbat and holiday services and serves the entire region of Kansai, which includes Osaka and Kyoto.

New Ontario health bill concerns Jewish agencies

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Will the 57 per cent of the Jewish people living outside central North York still be able to get home care services from the Jewish agencies they are used to?

This is one of the concerns arising from Ontario's Bill 173, which dramatically revamps such services to provide one-stop shopping for home services and folds 1,200 service groups in Ontario into 150 Multi-Service Agencies (MSA).

Though the bill is to be proclaimed March 31, the effective date of MSA operations is months in the future. In the interval, an Ontario election is due to be held Under the bill, the Central North York MSA will serve residents in the area between Dufferin and Yonge Streets, and Steeles Avenue and the City of Toronto boundary on the south.

"We are concerned about the implications of the bill for people in central North York and for those who live outside the geopolitical boundary of the MSA," said Moshe Greengarten, vice-president, public and community affairs of Baycrest Centre.

Of the total Jewish population of 162,605 in the greater Toronto area (1991 census), only 43 per cent live in the Central North York MSA area, 20 per cent in Toronto and 27 per cent in York Region.

Preliminary talks with York Region MSA have elicited a very cooperative spirit in providing services to Jewish residents, Greengarten said.

The Bernard Betel Centre in North York faces a 12 per cent cut in funding because of the new MSA, said executive director Esta Wall.

Negotiations on implementation of the Central North York MSA are continuing within a consortium chaired by Michael Scheinert, executive director of Senior Care and including Morris Zbar of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, Greengarten and Wall, and about 35 other community representatives. "The final report is a long way down the road," said Zbar.

One concern is that Jewish people outside the boundaries mentioned will not have accessibility to their normal services, Greengarten told The CJN. This includes meals on wheels, homemaker and nursing services, physiotherapists, occupational therapists and home support workers.

Though he concedes that there is concern among some Jewish groups, Scheinert believes the new MSA will be able to deliver an even higher standard of care than Senior Care, which is the main agency now providing services to Jewish people. It has a budget of $7 million, serves 3,500 to 4,000 people a year, employs 280 and has 400 volunteers. The Central North York MSA will serve an area with a more than 50 per cent Jewish population, he said.

Michael Sche'nert

Other ethnic communities also have concerns about the effect of Bill 173, Greengarten said. The question of how permeable the geographic boundaries will be has yet to be settled, he noted.

"We don't know if there will be only a limited number of exceptions to the boundary rules or whether it will be more extensive," he said.

The final decisions on this will be made by the District Health Councils of Metro Toronto and York Region.

On the other hand, Scheinert is confident that this should not be a cause for worry. "Your aunt on Spadina Road will still get the services she is used to," he said.

Controversy over Bill 173 is not confined to the Jewish community. The Victorian Order of Nurses, Red Cross and St. Elizabeth Visiting Nurses are opposed to it.

Ontario Health Minister Ruth Grier said the province already spends more than $1 billion on homemaker sevices and it must find a way to save money in the future, as the number of people over the age of 85 will increase by 125 per cent in the next 15 years.

A study commissioned by the Consumers Coalition for Senior Care Reform said the one-stop shopping for home services under Bill 173 will save $90 million in one year.

Coalition chair Jane Leitch told The CJN that some flexibility in boundaries is needed, but she is opposed to the idea if it increases the cost of serving ethnic communities.

Some powerful groups are opposed to Bill 173, Leitch said, but she thinks the MSAs will serve seniors better than the present system, because consumers and volunteers will be represented on their boards.

'Final' blood screening clinic being held for Jay Feinberg

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Time is closing in on Jay Feinberg.

The 26-year-old New Jersey man has seen his chronic myelogenous leukemia accelerate in recent weeks, to the point where drugs can no longer stem its advance.

But there is still a chance.

Supporters of Feinberg are holding what they are calling the last drive — one final mass blood screening to try to find a suitable bone marrow donor, while there is still a possibility that a bone marrow transplant will be successful.

It will be held March 26, from noon to 5 p.m., at B'nai Brith House, 15 Hove St.

His best chance of a successful match is someone of Eastern European descent.

The simple blood test can be taken by anyone 17 or older (younger with written parental permission), and in general good health. Blood type does not matter, and pregnant women can be tested.

Those previously tested need not be re-tested.

Barry Sherman of Apotex Inc., a major Toronto pharmaceutical company, is underwriting the cost of this clinic.

The Sherman family, says Apotex director of public and government affairs Elie Betito, has always been active in and supportive of the community.

When they were approached by the Stanleigh family, whose son, Audi, eight months ago received a life-saving bone marrow transplant from a Windsor man originally tested for Feinberg, Betito said, "they were touched by Jay's story. They didn't hesitate to help."

Audi Stanleigh told The CJN that he recognizes that Feinberg has "fought a tough battle.

"I want people to know that this might be the last time [to find a match for him], and that they should come out.

"I'm walking proof that there is hope," he added poignantly.

Results of the clinic will be entered in the Canadian and international bone marrow registries, so that others who need a transplant can benefit, just as Stanleigh did.

Mark Hart dies at 17

Mark Hart, a Toronto teenager who was also looking for a bone marrow donor, died last Wednesday. He was 17.

At the request of his family, a mass screening clinic planned by the social action committee of Temple Sinai Congregation, 210 Wilson Ave., will still go on, in Mark's memory.

The clinic will be held at the synagogue, March 26, from 11 to 3, and results will be entered in the Canadian and international registries, if potential donors agree.

The committee is also asking for donations to cover the testing.

Workshops planned for teachers

TORONTO — More than 650 Jewish day school teachers are expected to attend a day of lectures and workshops at Associated Hebrew Schools' Leslie campus Monday, March 27.

Education professor Walter Ackerman of Ben-Gurion University will be the keynote speaker.

The professional development day will offer 35 separate sessions in English and Hebrew on Jewish and general studies. Some of the sessions have been organized in cooperation with the Jewish Vocational Service Educational Counselling Centre.

UIA campaigns put focus on continuity

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

Barney Harris

VICTORIA — United Israel Appeal of Canada (UIA) campaigns have been "crisis driven" in past years, but emphasis is shifting to Jewish continuity in the Diaspora, said Barney Harris, national UIA field director.

Speaking at a meeting of the Combined Jewish Appeal of Victoria, Harris said that because of the crises Israel has faced, "we tended to gloss over the fact that longtime contributors are getting older and there hasn't been a bonding with the younger generation."

Those in their 30s, 40s and even 50s are removed from Holocaust thinking and the establishment of the State of Israel and are more concerned with such local needs as Jewish education for their children. The result, he said, is that UIA "must look to younger people in terms of Jewish continuity."

The Israel experience — sending people to Israel for several weeks, is one way to stir up interest in the Jewish state, Harris said. To help accomplish this, UIA is now prepared to provide funds to send young people to Israel or subsidize their trips.

Harris said the Ontario region has set aside $75,000 to subsidize trips. He said negotiations are in progress with other regions for similar programs.

"If we are concerned about Judaism surviving in the future, we must look to Israel as the linchpin," Harris said, in explaining why UIA funds are being used to encourage younger people to see Israel for themselves. "We must look to the future."

Harris said campaigns have generally been flat. Victoria's federated campaign last year raised close to $60,000, about the same amount raised 10 years ago.

Emphasizing that the UIA is supported now mainly by an older generation, he said that in Ontario, 1,200 cards in 29 small communities brought in a total of $900,000. Of this amount, 25 contributors, mainly over 65, gave $400,000.

The major givers, especially the older ones, are fully aware of Israel's needs and know that the continued welfare of Israel and Judaism is a Jewish problem.

"This type of thinking has to be translated into similar giving by the younger groups," he said.

Noting that in the United States intermarriage is up to 50 per cent and that only 28 per cent of their children will be raised as Jews, Harris said the disappearance of Jews is a fact that must become relevant to the younger element.

And Israel is still rescuing and absorbing large numbers of immigrants from the former Soviet Union and other parts of Europe. The Jewish Agency of Israel, which receives its funds from the UIA, handles this effort.

Harris and Orit Katsov, the Jewish Agency shaliach in Vancouver, called on the federated communities to set up endowment funds in addition to the annual campaigns.

National UIA planning conference in Montreal

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — A total of $12.1 million was raised last year by United Israel Appeal (UIA) of Canada Women's Division, according to Trudy Pekarsky, national chair of the division.

She described the campaigns as "flat," since the year before more than $13 million was raised.

For the 1995 campaigns, a national leadership conference will be held at the Ritz Carlton hotel in Montreal March 25 and 26, with the theme: In a world of constant change, we must change the way we campaign.

Young Adult leadership has been asked to join the conference and about 200 delegates are expected, Pekarsky said.

The principal speaker will be Itamar Rabinovich, Israel ambassador to the United States and chief negotiator in the peace talks with Syria.

Laurence N. Smith, vice-president of marketing and student affairs at Eastern Michigan University, an expert in marketing not-for-profit institutions, will address the group.

Other speakers include Dr. Baruch Gur, an authority on Jews of the former Soviet Union, and Arna Poupko, Judaic consultant for the Montreal federation.

A special session will be held on March 27 for small and intermediate communities, conducted by Norman Fishman, campaign director of the Minneapolis Federation of Jewish Services.

Sadly, Syria

U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher returned to Washington last week after a familiar but fatiguing series of shuttles among various Mideast capitals. In the end, he secured an agreement from the Syrian President Hafez al-Assad to allow the resumption of talks with Israel at the ambassadorial level. The talks are expected to restart within days. Despite the announcement however, there is no celebration in Washington or Jerusalem. It has taken the parties this long simply to come back to where they were at the beginning.

Next year is an election year in both Israel and the United States. Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and his government will be effectively precluded from negotiating with Assad during an election campaign. Similarly, President Bill Clinton and his government will be "distracted" from attempting to broker a Mideast settlement by the small matter of having to win re-election.

Assad is squandering the opportunity, yet again, to achieve any progress on substantive peace issues. Many seasoned and independent Israeli commentators such as Yoel Marcus of Haaretz are blaming him directly for the current stalemate. This is not surprising. They have seen his equivocation and his prevarication time and time again. What is surprising though, are the increasing indications that some of the American media too are finally beginning to lose patience with Assad's coy and cunning mind twists.

For example, in the March 19 issue of the Sunday New York Times, Thomas Friedman wrote: "Warren Christopher did yeoman's service last week in cajoling and enticing Syria's President Assad to resume peace talks with Israel. But frankly I'm really tired of watching secretaries of state trudge off to Damascus to beg Assad to resume negotiations that are in his self-interest. It's time for a new approach."

The Jews of Canada

Jews were in Canada even before there was a Canada. In fact, there is a story, perhaps apocryphal, that the first Jewish person here was Esther Brandau, a young French girl who smuggled herself into New France disguised as a boy, at a time when Jews were not allowed in this part of the world.

Whatever the truth of that story, it is indeed known that Aaron Hart came here with the British army when General Wolfe fought on the Plains of Abraham in 1759, and that the first synagogue was organized nine years later in Montreal.

Since the 18th century, Jews have continued to immigrate to Canada. And like all newcomers seeking to build a new life, they helped to build their new land in the process. Today, there are more than 350,000 Jewish people in Canada.

It is now almost 50 years since the end of World War II, the enormous, epoch-making event of modern Jewish history, which was a watershed for the history of Jewish Canada as well. We are also quickly approaching a change in the millenium. It is thus timely to reflect upon the Jewish community of Canada: where we came from, where we are now, and perhaps most important, where we appear to be headed.

Therefore, over the next few months, in a series of six articles organized by Leila Speisman, correspondents from west coast to east coast, in broad and colorful strokes, will paint a picture of the Jews of Canada. In this issue, we put first brush to canvas with a brief portrait of the Jewish community in British Columbia and the Northwest Territories.

Texture of Life

Also in this issue, we introduce an occasional column called The Texture of Life in Israel, in which we will attempt to convey an eclectic range of the myriad "off-beat" details of everyday, ordinary life in Israel. We hope the column will help readers to sense, to understand and even to feel aspects of Israeli life not normally described in the news and wire stories which are dominated by politics and security.

How to help the disadvantaged

I would like to comment on Rabbi Dow Marmur's article on the federal budget (CJN Mar. 9). I was pleased to see Rabbi Marmur raise an argument in a discussion of the budget that, for once, is not based on economics only. It is important for all Jews, not just rabbis, to fight for support of the weakest in our society. The Torah commands us all to care for the widow and orphan, and by extension all who have no one else to fight for them.

The dilemma that our finance minister finds himself in is his hands are tied by a combination of recent history and human nature. Federal governments of the last 20 years have indulged in reckless overspending, to the extent that our debt is seriously out of control. The only choices left are to sharply reduce spending (which will undoubtedly reduce needed health care and social services), or increase taxes. Unfortunately, the Canadian public has made it very clear that they will not stand for increased taxes. Altruism is not of the hallmark of the man-on-the-street. Thus, the finance minister has followed the only course that was left open for him.

I agree that as Jews we must press for help for the disadvantaged. However, I no longer see this help coming from government. I think that the rabbi's arguments must be directed at convincing the general public to voluntarily increase the amount that they provide to charities and self-help groups. Canadians are far less philanthropic than they should be; I think Rabbi Marmur and other religious leaders should be trying to convince the general public that it is their responsibility to help the needy. They can no longer expect government to do the job, as the money just isn't there.

Not enough women on committee

Re: "Plotnick chair of CJN advisory board" (CJN Montreal edition, March 2). I commend your appointment of a committee to provide the feeling of our Montreal community, its heart and soul. However, do you really think you can get to the heart of the matter with only three women on a committee with 13 men? I don't.

Congratulations to black winners

I was interested to read in the general press of the Black Business and Professional Association Awards given to many young black athletes, students and professionals for their achievements in various fields.

The story listed a number of civic dignitaries who were present, in addition to leading members of the black community. It seemed that every religious group was represented except the Jewish one. Was this an oversight on the part of the organizers, or did someone in the Jewish community not show up? Whatever, I think we should congratulate the young black people involved.

Never to return again

By Judith Rubinstein
Toronto

The year 1995 bears much significance for me. Fifty years ago this coming May, I was liberated from the cruel bondage of the Nazis. The Birkenau concentration camp with all its horrors was behind me. I was free at last. However, the first few days of freedom overwhelmed all of us survivors with uncertainty regarding the future. Where would we go? What would we find? Was it possible to heal the unbearable pain and suffering that had reduced us to breathing shells, broken in spirit and body?

The first decent food provided by our American liberators inadvertently caused much sickness and death. Our emaciated bodies simply could not absorb the food given us so generously by the kind-hearted soldiers. The hospitals were filled with former camp inmates whose stomachs had succumbed to the sudden overeating. Typhus and many other contagious diseses ravaged our weary bodies. But the slowest healing was psychological, not physical. It took a long time to be able to enjoy the freedom of walking on the streets without being watched by the Nazi guards. We were simply grateful to be alive, yet it was difficult to absorb the implications of the unexpected new reality.

After six weeks of uncertainty and worrying about my immediate family's fate, I finally returned to Hungary. In despair, I learned what I had suspected all along, that my beloved family was no longer alive. The city where I had been raised and had lived all my life had suddenly become a strange, repelling place, full of sad memories. Our former neighbors were apologetic, and obviously disturbed by our sudden reappearance. In their minds they had already buried all the Jews. Our house was occupied by strangers. The furniture and everything else that had once belonged to us had disappeared.

The final blow hit me when, on my first day back home, I saw a woman walking toward me on the main street wearing my mother's best dress. I just stared at her, stunned and speechless, the tears running down my cheeks. That did it. I ran as if someone were chasing me, back to the railway station, never to return again.

A chapter of my life was conclusively closed. But the pain will endure forever.

THE JEWS OF CANADA

British Columbia & N.W.T.

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

British Columbia is known as Lotusland but the Jews of B.C., right from its earliest history, were no lotus eaters. They were aggressive, adventurous, courageous — and they helped build a solid economic and social foundation for the province, with a zeal that continues to this day. They practised Judaism wherever they could find space, with or without a minyan.

Victoria was the first major Jewish centre in B.C., long before Vancouver, and despite its ups and downs, the Victoria community is again becoming a factor in Jewish life. At one time in its early history, it had the second largest Jewish population in Canada, after Montreal.

The first Jew in Victoria was Frank Sylvester, who came from San Francisco in July 1858. About 100 other Jews poured into this sleepy British colony on Vancouver Island, operated by the Hudson's Bay Co. The influx began when a gold strike was reported on the mainland and Jews, mainly from San Francisco, joined the rush. Some were miners and prospectors; others were traders supplying the miners.

By the fall of 1858, there were enough to hold High Holy Day services. In 1860, they bought land and consecrated the cemetery. Morris Price was the first to be buried in the Jewish cemetery — a victim of a murder.

Services were held in a local hotel, but in 1863, the Jews built Congregation Emanu-El, one of the first brick structures in Victoria, and now the oldest shul in continuous use in Canada. The land cost $7,300; the building, $9,195.

The opening of the shul was a major Victoria-wide event, complete with a parade of local dignitaries, the Navy band and representatives of most organizations. The opening was re-enacted in 1982, when the shul was renovated and rededicated, with the help of the B.C. government.

Probably because they were English-speaking and involved in business and in the social and cultural life of the city, the Jews integrated easily. This has been the story throughout the province, even after the mainland colony of British Columbia joined with Vancouver Island to form a province and enter Confederation.

The B.C. record of goodwill is clear: the first and only Jewish provincial premier in Canada was Dave Barrett; the first provincial chief justice, Nathan Nemetz; the first Jew in the House of Commons, Henry Nathan, an MP from Victoria; the first Jew in a British North American legislature, Selim Franklin; Selim's brother Lumley was second mayor of Victoria.

When the Canadian Pacific completed its continent-wide railway construction in Vancouver, most of Victoria's Jews crossed the 50 miles of the Georgia Straits to live there, depleting the community. But it is starting to come back. The Jewish population is now guestimated at close to 2,000.

Chuck Waldman, who has been the volunteer representative of the United Israel Appeal (UIA), reports about 200 subscribers, up from the usual 75 to 80. The Jewish telephone directory he compiles lists some 600 families, a substantial increase over the number in the 1993 book.

Waldman came to B.C. from Saskatchewan and first settled in Trail, in the Kootenays, in the Eastern part of the province. There were a few Jews there, who operated stores or worked for the Cominco mining empire.

"We had regular services in the community hall. We didn't have a Torah, but we did have a few siddurim. For very special occasions, we'd go to Spokane, Wash.," Waldman remembers.

When the Trail community diminished, Waldman and his wife Clare moved to nearby Rossland and then to Victoria in 1967, where both have been involved in the community, especially the synagogue. Chuck taught math in the public school system until his recent retirement.

The Victoria Jewish population is an eclectic mix of academics who teach at the University of Victoria (David Cohen, a native of Ottawa, is dean of law); there are Americans from Los Angeles who like the B.C. lifestyle and medicare; some New Yorkers, including a former cop; and a number of Holocaust survivors who erected the first Holocaust memorial in Western Canada.

One of the few Victoria-born residents is Ray Rose, a retired jeweller — but his wife is from Calgary. And there are retirees from the Prairies and a handful from Montreal, population, in contrast to the "revolving door" of the past, when rabbis came and went every year.

The synagogue school reports increased attendance in the preschool and more young people preparing for bar/bat mitzvah — so much so that a $1.5-million extension is under consideration.

Congregation Emanu-El has adopted egalitarian services, but the big question now is whether the women should be required to wear tallesim and kippot, especially when they are on the bimah.

But there are problems. An unofficial analysis of the 1991 census shows that in 64 per cent of Vancouver's Jewish households, both husband and wife are Jewish; in 36 per cent, one spouse is not Jewish. The intermarriage rate is estimated at double the percentage of intermarried Jewish families nationally.

Lawyer Richard Brail, born in Vancouver, says when he was a teenager, the Jewish population of about 8,000 was closely knit. The young people had AZA, BBYO, Young Judaea and other Jewish clubs to keep them together. Intermarriage or even interdating was not a problem then, he says. It developed only when Jews from other parts of Canada came with non-Jewish spouses.

Former B.C. premier Dave Barrett recalls an active Jewish life when he was younger and director of the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver (JCCGV). He also thinks "outside influences" have affected the intermarriage trend.

Intermarriage and assimilation are the primary concern of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver. Recently elected president Malcolm Weinstein says, "Our first challenge is to sustain our Jewish identity in the face of growing assimilation."

Last year the federation allocated over $1 million for Jewish education, camping, the JCCGV and other activities to stimulate Jewish life. The JCCGV is just completing a 100,000-square-foot $11-million expansion program which gives it a theatre, library and Holocaust centre, plus recreational and cultural activities, all geared to provide a Jewish atmosphere.

The 1991 census lists the Jewish population of the former Mainland, which includes Vancouver and the suburbs as far south as the United States border, as 19,375, but Drew Staffenberg, executive director of the federation, says it has been growing at a rate of three per cent a year since then. The federation has commissioned a demographic study; the report will be available in March. Canadian Jewish Congress Pacific region, which serves B.C. and the Northwest and Yukon territories, estimates a total population of its constituency at about 25,000.

When Vancouver became the predominant Jewish centre in B.C., the five Oppenheimer brothers, who operated trading posts on Vancouver Island, moved and became a major influence there and in the Cariboo. They owned land, began a steamship line and launched the first streetcar line.

David Oppenheimer, who was elected mayor for a four-year term in 1888, bought for the city the large tract of ocean-front property which is now famous as Stanley Park. He is fondly known as "the father of Vancouver." The Oppenheimers are all buried in Victoria.

By 1887, Vancouver Jews had two synagogues and land for a cemetery. The first synagogue was the Orthodox Sons of England, now Schara Tzedek, a fine building on Oak Street, in the area where most Jewish institutions are located. There are now 14 congregations in Greater Vancouver.

The Louis Brier Home and Hospital for the elderly accommodates over 275 people, including one woman whose husband was lieutenant-governor of Jamaica.

A new synagogue-community centre in Kelowna, in the interior, has been built by the bustling Okanagan Jewish community of about 100 families.

Vancouver's population comes literally from all over the world. Of 548 clients served by the Jewish Family Services Agency last year, there were immigrants from Central and South America, Russia, China, India, Morocco, Ethiopia and South Africa, as well as 14 families from Sarajevo. There is also a steady influx of migrants from the Prairies, who prefer the milder (but wet) winters.

Far north, in the Northwest Territories, reports Sheldon Nider, who heads the Arctic region of Congress, Jews came as fur trappers and traders, and many worked on the Dew Line along the Arctic coast during the Cold War.

When mines opened in Yellowknife, the capital, Jewish businessmen were amongst the early residents, joined by teachers, doctors, social workers and other professionals working for the government. There are small Jewish communities in Yellowknife, Hay River, Fort Smith and Iqaluit. Nider's son learned his maftir by using tapes from a Vancouver rabbi. He had his bar mitzvah in Vancouver.

Max Macara of Victoria spent 32 years in Yellowknife. A steam engineer, he worked for the mines and operated a laundry and cleaning firm, and watched the shanty town of 500 grow into a modern northern city. He sent his kids to Talmud Torah in Edmonton for their education.

Leah Glick-Stal of Victoria took all her schooling in Yellowknife, while Esther Tennenhouse-Wynne of Victoria used to build a Chanukah ice menorah in her front yard when she lived in Yellowknife.

Each Israel visit has own message

It's 2:15 a.m., and all around me, on El Al flight 001 to New York, people are sleeping. As for me, my memories seem to keep me awake.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

In a way my latest visit to Israel was an anniversary: it was 60 years ago when I was there for the first time, a brief two weeks to see the land, to report back home and to participate in the Second Maccabiah. I did not come from a Zionist home, but having seen the land and its pioneers I was changed forever.

This time my journey had multiple purposes: to lecture — as I do every year — at Haifa and Ben-Gurion universities (on the concept of chosenness), at the Van Leer Institute in Jerusalem (on Benno Jacob, biblical scholar), and to participate in the 104th annual convention of the Central Conference of American Rabbis.

As usual, we heard an array of Israel's political leaders — including President Ezer Weizman, Yitzhak Rabin, Shimon Peres and Likud leader Binyamin Netanyahu — some of whom gave us extended time for (occasionally heated) discussion. That was especially true for the president, who loves debate and engaged us in questions about pluralism in Israel versus the religious status quo. (We argued for the former, he defended the latter.) In the end, as is so often the case, no one's mind was changed but the debate revealed much about Israel, which I found vibrant as usual.

Social and cultural issues predominated with the other Israelis whom we met, and our own discussions were lively and informative. And of course we spent time with Israelis young and old. Much of the time it is they who teach us most about the country.

Naturally, wherever I went I asked how people felt about the peace process; what did they think would or should happen. My contacts ranged from family to old friends, some of whom were former diplomats. Besides, there were always cabbies, like those who drove me from Tel Aviv to Haifa, to Jerusalem, to Beersheva and to Lod.

My samples were few, sometimes preselected (like diplomats), but mostly random. The majority expressed a mix of hope and anxiety, and no one thought what had taken place could be reversed. The question in every one's mind was how much Israel could afford to risk and still be secure enough in case the process fails and, as they said time and again, "we have to fight again."

With everyone either serving in the reserves, or having children and grandchildren in the armed forces, war is a terrible possibility which Israelis take into consideration. I heard one woman speak about her family on TV. She explained that she and her husband had decided on having three children, "in case we have to fight again and one of my children gets killed, we'll still have two left." I couldn't sleep that night.

Yet, despite the doubts, the eternal optimism of the people showed through. Everyone wants peace, there is no question about that. But people wonder where the Arabs stand, what their intentions are. They are all hotly debating the pace of negotiations: Is it too fast and too far-reaching? Is there enough time for testing one another out? Since there is no going back, those who talked with me were afraid and hopeful at the same time.

I never tire of admiring the thirst for culture that so many have. There are always appreciative listeners for music and lectures, and many in the audience are experts in the field. To talk to and with them and to taste the flavor of the land anew is my yearly revitalization exercise.

Soon I'll be back in Canada, and Canadian concerns will claim my attention once again. In Israel, Canada is hardly ever mentioned. Only CNN International brought news of the fishing problems off our east coast. Otherwise, whenever I ask what people know about Canada, the answer is always the same: "Cold."

For them, we are far away. Never mind, they are always close to us.

To Jordan and back home

After decades of life behind hostile frontiers, Israelis are eager to experience the thrill of a visit to a neighboring country. Now, as the fascination with Egypt has somewhat receded and as foreign tourists are not all that welcomed by the Islamic fundamentalists in that country, it is Jordan's turn. There are two crossing points, one near Eilat, where the peace agreement was signed and one at the Sheik Hussein bridge near Beth-She'an in the Jordan Valley.

By Yeshayahu Nunez

Our bus was the 18th at the border and after long hours of bureaucratic and security routines on both sides, we entered the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan.

The nature is beautiful, the country rich in archeological sites. The elaborate architecture of the Nabataean fortress of Petra is of breathtaking beauty. The biblical Mount Nevo offers the visitor a spectacular glimpse of the Holy Land, the same view that Moses was allowed to enjoy shortly before his death.

The capital, Amman, a clean city on several hills separated by valleys, is a large mosaic of boroughs, in which a stratified populace — squalid Palestinian refugee camps at the edges, poor quarters of urbanized Bedouins and luxurious sectors of the very rich — coexist in apparently accepted social calm. Villages look desolate, but here and there planned modernization is underway.

A British-invented desert kingdom at the beginning, and a growing society without a past, Jordan's existence and economy were directly affected by the many political tremors of the Middle East. The 1948 and Six Day Wars brought masses of Palestinian refugees, many of whom then fled to Lebanon during the upheaval of the PLO (Black September, 1970) and further upset the country's delicate balance. During the Lebanese civil war of the '70s, Amman for a while became the financial surrogate for devastated Beirut.

Later, in the wake of the Gulf War, 200,000 Palestinians expelled from Kuwait invested their wealth in the Jordanian economy. Still not forgiven by the Saudis for siding with the Iraqi dictator, the Jordanian King has now chosen peace with Israel as his new option for international assistance and accelerated development.

Visiting Israelis can feel how much hope is being attached by the regime and even by ordinary Jordanians to the prospective dividends of peace. Since promised American aid was slow in coming and even looked uncertain for a while, Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres were in Amman for consultations to finalize joint development plans and played their own part in Washington and elsewhere in confirming and accelerating the flow of international aid.

On our return, we found Jerusalem traffic clogged by the visits of British Prime Minister John Major and U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher. On his first visit here, Major compared the ups and downs of his own peace plan in Northern Ireland with that in the Middle East.

Christopher was there to revive the bogged down Israeli-Palestinian negotiations, but was mainly active in trying to remove the obstacles which had practically brought the Israeli-Syrian negotiations to a standstill. It seems the American role in assisting the peace process here is changing in both pace and character and, as a result of this latest Christopher visit, things may start moving more rapidly on both tracks.

The negotiations with Syria are to be resumed by ambassadors this week in Washington and will eventually be upgraded if progress is made.

Meanwhile and in a rather oblique way, the Israeli public is being prepared for a settlement with Syria, based on the principle that the possible evacuation of the Golan will be gradual and balanced by tight security provisions, which are still the object of hard bargaining with President Hafez Al Assad.

As for the Palestinian issue, the upset timetable for the implementation of the original Oslo accord is now being readjusted. Though the official government position on the frontiers with the Palestinian entity is still uncertain, the new Israeli aim seems to be a territorial compromise whereby nearly 70 per cent of the Jewish settlers will remain under Israeli jurisdiction and 12 per cent of the West Bank will be annexed. It is obvious that these ideas will be vigorously opposed by both the opposition in Israel and the Palestinians. But as the alternative for both sides is the very dangerous status quo, one can hardly dismiss them.

The Rabin government has 20 months left to regain popularity before it faces the voters. Will it choose to present an image of unyielding toughness or try to win support by speeding up and completing the peace process? Peres seems to believe that the lack of visible progress on the road to peace has eroded public support, and that it can be restored by meeting the hard challenges courageously. Rabin is tight-lipped and is, in any case, committed to holding a national referendum over the Golan issue.

Since the primaries for the next general elections are to start soon, internal politics may well dominate the scene. With politicians in camps struggling for individual survival, the 20 months of grace and choice may in fact be much shorter than expected.

Biblical Academy Awards are back

Last month, I had the distinct (and extinct) honor of sharing with you the deeply moving, profoundly meaningful Biblical Academy Awards, brought to you directly from Holy-Wood, as they have been, since time immemorial.

By Allan Gould

Alas, just like the slightly-more-famous Oscars, we ran out of time (and space). So let me bring you up to date, just in case you were in Israel (donating your precious Canadian dollars to your fellow Jews) or maybe even in Florida (spending your worthless Canadian dollars).

It was the annual Biblical Academy Awards, where the HALO (representing The Heavenly Academy of Laudable Orations) was being given out for the Best Performances and Productions from the Bible. Jonah has just won the HALO for Special Effects (for the film Jews One), but, in the grand tradition of Holy-Wood, he went on for far too long. We return you to our program. . . .

(Korach staggers unto the stage, to wild applause and cheering.

Korach: Thanks, Delilah, baby. And my thanks to all of you. (The cheering starts again) You like me! You honestly like me! You know, I'm just thrilled to be alive, again, and here tonight, to present the next HALO for Special Effects. The nominees are . . . (He looks up and reads from the tablet-shaped cue cards):

The Creation of the World, The Burning Bush, The Ten Plagues, The Parting of the Red Sea and the Giving of the Ten Commandments, all from the big-budget epic, Dial G for G-d, based on that all time best-seller, The Hebrew Testament, written, produced, and directed by Ha-Shem.

And Jonah Being Swallowed by the Whale, from that remarkable underwater movie, Jews One, produced and directed by Ninevah Productions.

Korach: May I have the scroll, please? (To the audience) I can't deny it, I have a personal favorite, since I had some bad experiences during that Exodus flick. (He struggles painfully to unravel the scroll) And the winner is . . . What a surprise! Holy-Wood and Ninevah have often been compared to each other, too! The winner is — Jonah Being Swallowed by the Whale!

Jonah: (Marching across the stage in a sheet, he grabs the halo statuette eagerly from Korach) Thanks, Korey! (To audience) You know, I hardly even know how to begin. I'm so unaccustomed to public speaking — which was my problem in the first place!

Korach: Uh, to present our next HALO — please give a big hand, and an outstretched arm, to the man who gave meaning to the phrase "hard-hearted." Would you all please welcome Pharoah!

Pharaoh: (Marches out proudly to a lush musical rendition of the famous spiritual Let My People Go. He looks amazingly like Yul Brenner) Thanks, Kory, baby! Now, to show all of you that I'm harboring no hard feelings whatsoever for those nasty things done to my river, my country, my army — not to mention my first-born — I'm pleased to have the honor to present the award for Best Supporting Actor. The nominees are . . . (He looks up to heaven, to read the list)

Israel's border wars

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

During the first years of its existence, Israel was beset by mounting terrorism, a recurring phenomenon which took a toll in lives and property losses.

Arab infiltrators, invariably Palestinians who had been dispossessed by the 1948 War of Independence, raided Israel, stealing crops and livestock, destroying buildings, pipelines and equipment, and murdering Israelis.

As a result, settlers lived in dread, while the Israeli government feared that the raids would sabotage its plans to populate strategic border regions.

With no letup in the terrorism, Israel took matters into its own hands, formulating a retaliatory policy that became a hallmark of the Israeli armed forces.

In what is apparently the first detailed account of this period, Israeli historian Benny Morris traces the evolution of Israel's tit-for-tat policy. He examines the types of infiltration that occurred, the evolution of Israel's response, and the role of the Arab states in this cycle of violence.

His book, Israel's Border Wars:1949-1956 (Oxford University Press, $59.50), is meticulously researched and cleanly written. Morris, a fellow of the Truman Institute at the Hebrew University, scoured the files of the Israel State Archives, the Israeli Ministry of Defence, the Central Zionist Archives and the United Nations Archive, among others. As well, he has immersed himself deeply in the Hebrew and English literature of this topic.

Not surprisingly, then, Israel's Border Wars is a sober, thoroughly informative volume that sheds light on events which a new generation of readers may find quite interesting.

The story begins during the War of Independence, a conflict that triggered the exodus of several hundred thousand Palestinian Arabs from their homes in what is now Israel.

According to Morris, the first wave of Arab infiltration began even as the War of Independence raged. Arab farmers who had fled, or been evicted, from their lands returned to reap the summer harvest.

From Israel's perspective, the marauders were not merely enagaged in petty pilfering. They threatened Jewish settlement activity and property, not to mention Jewish lives.

Israeli officials, rightly so, believed that the cross-border raiding was largely politically-motivated, animated by a desire for vengeance, whether personal or national.

The raiders were also driven by other considerations. Some wanted to exact revenge on Israeli Arabs who had thrown in their lot with Israel. Still others, especially along the Egyptian and Syrian fronts, were on spy missions. A handful crossed into Israel with a vague nostalgic desire to see abandoned homes, fields and landscapes.

The marauding peaked in 1952, when the Israel Defence Forces recorded some 16,000 cases of infiltration: 11,000 along the Jordanian frontier, and 5,000 along the Egyptian border. There was a gradual drop in incidents after 1952, police records show.

Israeli civilian fatalities ebbed and flowed. Twenty two Israelis were killed in 1949; 19 in 1950; 48 in 1951; 42 in 1952; 44 in 1953; 33 in 1954; 24 in 1955; and 54 in 1956. During this period, which extended to the 1956 Sinai war, more than 200 Israeli soldiers fell in clashes with infiltrators.

The hardliners, led by Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion and Chief of Staff Gen. Moshe Dayan, called for firm measures to deter further raids. The softliners, spearheaded by Foreign Minister Moshe Sharett, believed in restraint.

The hardliners prevailed.

Until the early 1950s, Arab villages were the targets of Israeli reprisals. But in the wake of the October 1953 Qibya raid into Jordan, Israel's policy shifted and military and police bases in Arab countries were usually targeted.

Morris portrays the Qibya raid as a turning point in Arab-Israeli relations. Provoked by a vicious attack which claimed the lives of a mother and her two young children in the village of Yehud, the reprisal resulted in the deaths of 69 Jordanians, the majority of whom were women and children.

The raiders belonged to Unit 101, which had been set up in August 1953 with the express purpose of combatting terrorism. One of its commanders was Ariel Sharon, a future defence minister.

The Qibya raid caused universal condemnation, and curiously enough, an official denial by Ben-Gurion. In a broadcast to the nation, the prime minister declared: "...Israel rejects with all vigor the absurd and fantastic allegation that ... the Israel Defence Force took part in the action ... it is clear beyond a doubt that not a single army unit was absent from its base on the night of the attack on Qibya."

David Ben-Gurion (front row centre) and Moshe Sharett (to Ben-Gurion's right) were at odds over Israel's policy of retaliation.

Until Qibya, Israel almost invariably dissociated itself from its reprisal raids, attributing the attacks to "unidentified vigilante border settlers." After Qibya, however, the government openly owned up to its retaliatory policy.

Qibya, Morris writes, forced Ben-Gurion to acknowledge Israel's heretofore shadowy policy, and emboldened Israel to strike hard against the Egyptian army in the Gaza Strip in 1954 and 1955.

More often than not, Israel charged Egypt with instigating or encouraging infiltration from Gaza and the Sinai Peninsula. But in Morris' view, Egypt, with few exceptions, consistently opposed infiltration.

It is true, he concedes, that Egypt sent squads into Israel to gather intelligence. Often, its members stole, sabotaged and murdered. But until 1954, the year of a big Israeli raid into Gaza, Egypt's overriding concern was to avoid provoking Israel, he claims.

On Feb. 27, 1955, Israeli commandos raided an Egyptian army camp north of Gaza City, killing a large number of Egyptian soldiers. The reprisal was in retaliation for a series of incidents in the heart of Israel traced to maurauders from Gaza.

In Morris' estimation, the raid had short-term and long-range implications. While boosting Israeli morale, it shocked Egypt's leadership, drastically altering Egyptian President Gamal Abdel Nasser's view on the possibility of coexistence with Israel.

The raid, suggests Morris, hardened Egyptian policy toward Israel. It prompted Nasser to sponsor a terrorist campaign against Israel, to stop toying with the idea of reaching a political accommodation with Israel, and to sign a major arms deal with Soviet client state Czechoslovakia to offset Israel's military preponderance.

Jordan's attitude to infiltration, he adds, was clear.

King Hussein, who had enough dire problems at home without antagonizing Israel, opposed infiltration and tried, though not successfully, to prevent it.

The Jordanian government realized that Israeli reprisals imperilled Jordan's viability and its territorial integrity. But since more than half of Jordan's population consisted of Palestinians, King Hussein felt he was under an obligation to consider their grievances against Israel.

Arab commentators were in the habit of writing that Israeli reprisals into Jordan were designed to seize land. Morris disputes this claim, saying there is no evidence for it. Indeed, before the 1956 Sinai war, Israel had no interest in capturing chunks of Arab territory on a permanent basis.

Unlike Jordan and Egypt, Syria exercised strict control over its border with Israel. Consequently, cases of uncontrolled infiltration from Syria were "very rare" from 1949 to 1956.

Be that as it may, Syria allowed infiltrators, usually peasants, into the disputed demilitarized zones along parts of the Israeli border.

Like Syria, Lebanon opposed infiltration, making efforts to halt it. The Lebanese government transferred many Palestinian refugees away from the border, to camps near Beirut, Tyre and Sidon, and thereby ameliorated the problem.

Till 1967, Lebanon was Israel's quietest border. But in the aftermath of the Six Day War, the PLO established camps on Lebanese soil, thus setting the stage for a long series of punishing Israeli retaliatory strikes into Lebanon that continue to this day.

Mideast Analysis

By Sheldon Kirshner

Isolating Iran

Israel has launched an international campaign to isolate Iran, a growing, menacing power in the Middle East.

Under the sway of an Islamic fundamentalist regime since 1979, Iran is viewed as a threat by Israel and most of Tehran's Arab neighbors.

The Israeli government is suspicious of Iran because it rejects Israel's very existence and opposes the current Mideast peace process through proxies like Hamas, Islamic Jihad and an array of Palestinian rejectionist organizations based in Syria.

Arab countries such as Saudi Arabia, Egypt and the Gulf states have accused Iran of promoting subversion with the intention of creating a new Islamic order. By all accounts, Iran is working closely with Sudan, an Islamic fundamentalist state which, observers believe, is supplanting Syria as a hub of Middle Eastern terrorist movements.

All agree that Iran is trying to replace Iraq, humbled in the 1991 war by the United States and a coalition of allies, as the predominant military power in the Persian Gulf.

Under the now ousted pro-Western Pahlavi monarchy, Iran harbored similar ambitions. But it had no interest in subverting its neighbors, nor was it against Israel's existence.

According to a new study by Israeli scholar Ephraim Kam, published in The Middle East Military Balance (Westview Press), Iran has embarked on a multi-billion dollar program to rebuild its armed forces and to acquire a nuclear capability.

Iran's army, air force and navy were shattered during its inconclusive eight-year war with Iraq in the 1980s. Now Iran is rearming at a furious pace, buying aircraft, tanks, submarines and missiles, mainly from Russia, China, North Korea and Eastern European countries like Czechoslovakia, Poland and Hungary.

Iran is also developing a nuclear force. Israel and the United States claim that the Iranians are just five to 15 years away from developing an atomic bomb. Iran counters that its nuclear program is only for peaceful purposes.

Tehran has acquired nuclear technology from a variety of sources, notably Russia, China and Pakistan, and apparently recruited scientists from the former Soviet Union. Analysts believe that Iranian nuclear warheads could be delivered by its surface-to-surface missiles.

Israel wants economic and political pressure to be exerted on Iran so that it will modify its policies. But few countries have signed on, unwilling to curb their lucrative trade with Iran.

Israel has struck back at Iranian-backed terrorism by hitting Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Hezbollah bases in the territories and Lebanon. But these attacks, while sometimes devastatingly effective, have not really deterred Israel's enemies.

Israel has never mounted a reprisal raid on Iran itself. It could be a risky venture, given the logistical problems and the possible political fallout. But nothing can be ruled out.

Rabbinic Reflections

By RABBI
LOUIS I. SCHECHTER

This is a special Shabbat. We take out two Torahs. We learn about a ceremony that was necessary for the Jewish people to enter the Temple.

We learn that anyone who came in contact with the dead would become ritually unclean. To become ritually clean, they had to immerse themselves in a mikvah, and they also had to, on the third and seventh day, be sprinkled with a mixture of water and the ashes of a red cow.

The rabbis are very puzzled by this ceremony. Judaism was the first religion which separated magic from religion. Magic means a person can, by reciting certain words or doing certain acts, gain control and force the gods to do what he wants.

We do not believe in that. We believe we cannot force G-d to do anything. We pray to G-d and ask for His help, but He does not have to listen to us. He takes into account our prayers, but we cannot force Him to do anything. This is probably for the best, too, because sometimes the very worst thing would be to have one's wishes granted.

The ceremony of the red heifer almost smacks of magic. The rabbis tell us that a dead body really does not defile and the ashes really do not clean. This is just a law which G-d has given us, in order to teach us many important things and to let us know that we must obey His decrees.

One of the paradoxes of the whole ceremony was that although the ashes of the red cow purified those who were unclean, anybody who had a part in preparing these ashes themselves became unclean. These ashes had the capacity to make clean the unclean and to make unclean the clean.

There are many interpretations given for this ceremony, but one of the most striking interpretations is that the ceremony was intended to teach man that he cannot arrive at a high spiritual stage unaided.

We need the differing views of other people, in order to clarify our own views and to allow us to reach a high spiritual state. No person can grasp the whole truth. Only G-d knows that. We need the input of other people in order to attain even part of the truth and to clarify and purify the truth so that it will enable us and not degrade us.

I believe that within Judaism there is more of the truth than in other groups. People always ask me, "Rabbi, how can you be so tolerant? If you have the truth, they must be wrong and you should therefore shun them and have nothing to do with them. After all, either you have the truth or you do not. If you have the truth, you are right and they are wrong."

But it is not so simple. Truth must always be put in a context. In Judaism, we have always recognized that no one can attain the whole truth and that only by the interchange of ideas with others can we clarify the truth we have and make it more useful and more beneficial.

The whole Talmud is really an example of this. Throughout the Talmud there are hundreds of disagreements between the school of Hillel and the school of Shamai. Why must we discuss these hundreds of disagreements?

We know that Halachah follows the school of Hillel and not the school of Shamai in all but a handful of cases. Why should we discuss these disagreements?

The answer is that by knowing what the school of Shamai said, the school of Hillel clarified their own views, gained a greater understanding of them, and thus were able to grasp more of the truth. In fact, the rabbis say the school of Hillel learned what the school of Shamai taught, but the school of Shamai did not learn what the school of Hillel taught. The school of Shamai, therefore, did not have enough insight into the truth to understand the problems correctly.

That, I believe, is the symbolism of the red heifer. Man cannot find the truth unaided; we need other people. If we believe that people come to learn from us because we have the whole truth, then we ourselves become unclean.

When it comes to truth, we must approach it honestly. We cannot use tricks or stratagems. If we do, we are lost.

When it comes to truth, we must be honest, and we must honor and work with other people who are also honest, even though we do not believe they have the truth, because by discussing issues with them we clarify and gain greater understanding of our own truth.

Family involvement stressed

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN

Jewish education is the antidote to assimilation and intermarriage, says the new director of education at the United Congregational Schools of Greater Toronto (UCS), a supplementary Hebrew school with about 300 students.

"It is important, however, to ensure that children are not educated in isolation. The family plays a large role in Jewish education," said Dr. Edmond Lipsitz.

Lipsitz, who recently retired as executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, is so adamant about family education that he developed the Parent Education Program at UCS, which allows parents to study at the same time as their children.

"Parents who show their children that they too want to learn become good role models," Lipsitz said. "Many parents are unable to help their children with their Hebrew studies because they don't know the language. This is their opportunity."

Pre-bar and bat mitzvah students at UCS undertake a special mitzvah program that also emphasizes family learning. Parents and children come together six times during the year for programs that may include lectures, prayers or a visit to the Holocaust Memorial Centre. Girls prepare a challah cover and the boys prepare tallesim.

UCS also offers the Academy for Advanced Learning, a program for teenagers between 13 and 16 who are not currently receiving a Jewish education. The three-year program ends with a six-week study trip in Israel. "I feel strongly that Jewish studies should not end with the bar or bat mitzvah," Lipsitz said.

The discussion-style Academy courses include the Jewish life cycle, the Bible and rabbinical literature, the Holocaust and Zionism.

Lipsitz says there are about 6,000 students in afternoon Hebrew schools in the Toronto area and he is disappointed about the level of community funding.

Kaddish an affirmation of life during mourning

By SUSAN STEINBERG

It is barely a few weeks since my father died. I feel raw, vulnerable, tender. The loss rips through me, as I begin to understand with gripping clarity the difference between lonely and alone.

The void, the loneliness, is intense. Heavy sadness envelops me. I begin to learn the hard work of grieving.

GUEST VOICES

I recall the closing words of a Woody Allen movie: "Memory ... Is memory that which we take with us, or that which we leave behind?" In this intense present moment I learn it is both.

Behind are the times my Dad and I spent together. Behind are moments fondly recalled of things we did together, of values learned and ideas shared, of our history which becomes most precious in this time of loss.

Whether remembering the learning of a skill like swimming, taught with patience, thoroughness and persistence, or the joy of culture through music and ballet, the reflections of time spent with Dad flood my memory.

And then there was his deep love of knowledge and the profound recognition as well as the full joy and awe and wonder of living. Listen. Learn. Read. He spoke about it. He practised it. There were always new ideas to explore and integrate at any age. The great historians, philosophers and thinkers of our time became friends with whom I could learn and grow.

So Daddy, you are gone from our midst. Yet in so many ways your memory, via your values, attitudes, beliefs and personal qualities, live on through us as we integrate into our existence and being parts of who you were.

The ritual of Kaddish, a prayer recited twice daily for a year, assists me in the process of grieving.

As I am welcomed into both familiar and unknown synagogue congregations, I repeat this prayer, which honors life and the living within a community of others learning to live with loss. We share feelings of our loss and pain. Sometimes we say nothing. Yet each of us knows at some deep level what the other has been through. And it soothes. It feels good. We work through the feelings, the pain. We grieve, we mourn our loss, each in our own way.

This wonderful Jewish tradition, which paradoxically celebrates life as it allows us to cope with death, is powerful. On the one hand, life is business as usual as each of us goes about the tasks of daily living. On the other hand this ritual provides a patterned and structured repetitive pause in which to remember. It is an active expression, and in that activity, though I am lonely, I am not alone.

The Kaddish — an affirmation of life in the time of death — contains a wisdom that existed long before psychotherapy and grief support groups were known.

There is such magnitude and simplicity and beauty in this tradition in which our daily presence states that we choose to honor life; we have this built-in opportunity to re-evaluate who we are and where we came from.

I truly appreciate more fully the value and importance of Jewish community, as Kaddish is recited amidst the minimum of 10 men. In my work as counsellor and teacher, as I assist others on clarifying who they are and what they want during their life journey more fully, I learn that Judaism has much to teach about this subject.

In my loss and loneliness, I have a chance to feel and work through my feelings. I have an opportunity to mourn my father and at the same time to value and celebrate life. I grow to appreciate more deeply how my Dad continues to live in me, with me, and through me through my children. The chain of Jewish life continues and the daily recitation of Kaddish says that each life truly matters.

And so I continue to remember. I remember those events that are now history. Yet in so many ways I carry them forward into the present. Through me, in my behaviors and actions, in my values and my activities.

I again recall Dad's last few breaths. I was witness to his final moments. Like a clock winding down, each breath was longer and shallower. This special human being, who gave me life, simply stopped.

Yet I know he would want those he loved to go on. The greatest testimony to his life will be for us to live. And so, Dad, amidst my pain and loneliness, I fondly recall you, my Dad, my teacher, my mentor, my friend. I will also remember to live fully, each day, as a way of honoring you. Yet still, and always, the loneliness and the void.

Monte Carlo benefits JCT

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO —The moment of truth at the annual Monte Carlo dinner — no matter how tasty and sumptuous the meal — comes after the dessert and Birkat Hamazon, when 10 names are drawn for the $5,000 grand prize.

But this year the 10 lucky people whose names were selected opted to split the prize — each of them winning $500.

The Monte Carlo night has been organized for the last 20 years by David Anisman to raise funds for Israel. This year some 400 people attended the dinner, held at the Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

The big winner of the evening was the Jerusalem College of Technology (JCT), which has received the funds raised by the Monte Carlo dinner for the last four years.

Anisman, a member of the board of directors of Canadian Friends of JCT, spearheaded a campaign, which over the years has raised $500,000 for JCT from the Monte Carlo dinner, as well as through private donations.

At the dinner, he presented JCT president Joseph Bodenheimer with a cheque for $200,000, which will go towards the construction of a new dormitory.

NCJW prepares to collect for Passover food drive

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Next week Council House, the Bathurst Street headquarters of National Council of Jewish Women (NCJW), Toronto section, will begin its annual transformation into a temporary warehouse for Passover supplies as the organization prepares for its largest community service project.

Volunteers are still needed to pack boxes for delivery to over 2,000 local households. Recipients, whose names are supplied by Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS), include new immigrants and others on fixed incomes.

Volunteers are also needed on delivery day, April 9, to load cars, drive, accompany drivers and help deliver boxes, said Mindy Rosenberg, Passover drive coordinator and vice-president, service portfolio, for Toronto section. Delivery is usually finished by noon, she added.

Boxes include matzah, wine, candles and a Haggadah (in Russian for Russian recipients), as well as a frozen chicken donated by Chai Kosher Poultry, gefilte fish, chicken soup, jam, juice or borscht, two desserts and tea or coffee.

"[Recipients] have enough to make a seder and to celebrate Passover with dignity," said Rosenberg.

Cash donations welcome

The Board of Jewish Education (BJE), JF&CS and JIAS have been involved in the project since its inception in 1986. The BJE informs affiliated schools of the need for donations and sends students to help with the project.

Cash donations as well as food contributions are "very much welcome," Rosenberg. "It costs over $30,000 over and above what we get from the community" to supplement the food donations with items such as kosher wine, which is purchased at a reduced price.

Last year, Canadian Jewish Congress' Moess Chittin Campaign contributed $15,000 to supplement the food donations.

To help raise funds, the organization recently introduced Passover-themed tribute cards, selling for $10 apiece. Proceeds go to the Passover Food Drive.

Food can be dropped off at Council House, 4700 Bathurst St., Willowdale, from March 27 to April 6.

Any food which cannot be used for the project will be redistributed. Passover food received after the boxes are packed will be given to the Russian Jewish Community Centre for distribution to recipients not on the NCJW list. Non-kosher or stale-dated Passover food will be given to North York Food Harvest.

"It's a real mitzvah," said Rosenberg of the project. "It makes it worthwhile to know that you've done something good for somebody."

For more information or to volunteer, call Council House at 416-633-5100.

Agunah vigil held in Toronto

last should provide an opportunity for the partners to go on with their lives.''

The vigil was spearheaded by the International Coalition for Agunah Rights (ICAR) and organized by the Toronto branch of the Canadian Coalition of Women for the Get, which comprises the Beth Tikvah Social Action committee, B'nai Brith Women, Emunah Women, Hadassah-WIZO, Na'amat, National Council of Jewish Women, Women's Toronto ORT and Jewish Women's Federation.

A vigil was held concurrently in Montreal, and vigils are scheduled imminently in Vancouver, Edmonton and Winnipeg. Educational programs are planned in other Canadian cities.

At the Toronto vigil, representatives of the eight member organizations participated in a candlelighting ceremony and read descriptions of agunot who had suffered beatings, broken bones and other forms of abuse by their husbands.

A former agunah who attended the vigil told The CJN that her four-year ordeal was ''very lonely and demeaning.''

Joyce Eklove, acting chair of the Toronto Coalition, who has been married for 32 years, emphasized that participants in the vigil were not necessarily agunot. ''Each person must take responsibility and be accountable,'' she said.

Glennie Lindenberg, president of the Toronto Jewish Women's Federation, an umbrella organization representing 50 women's groups, told the audience that Canadian divorce law can help agunot. (see sidebar)

She cautioned that appropriate legal recourse is neither automatic nor universally known, even among lawyers. ''If you know a woman in the midst of a separation or divorce, make sure she knows the legal remedies,'' Lindenberg advised.

Ophira Sone of the Beth Tikvah social action committee, wearing a Freedom for Agunot Now button and a yellow ribbon to symbolize solidarity for captives, read ICAR's Prayer for Agunot.

Following the conclusion of the formal ceremony, a number of participants marched with placards to demonstrate on Bathurst Street at the suggestion of Etty Danzig, president of Na'amat.

''Something has to be done,'' said one agunah, who wished to remain anonymous. ''It's a tragedy to get a divorce, but it's still more traumatic to be married when your marriage is over.''

Time for a good night's sleep

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Don't blame today's stressful world if you can't get a good night's sleep.

''Life has always been tough; it's no worse today than it was 1,000 years ago,'' said psychiatrist Dr. Mortimer Mamelak, coordinator of the Sleep Disorders Program at Baycrest Centre.

His formula for six to eight hours of restful sleep is to arrange your lifestyle so that you go to bed at the same time each night and get up at the same time.

''The best way to get a good night's sleep is to enjoy your life in the daytime,'' Mamelak said. The problem with some elderly people is that they are not active enough in the daytime, and may be the victims of too much sleep during the day. However, the lack of sleep may be rooted in depession or medical problems.

''Don't tell me you need a sleeping pill,'' he told an elderly man who was in the habit of interrupting his sleep at about 1 a.m. to watch a favorite TV show.

The patient followed the doctor's advice but later complained, ''This is joyless, I enjoyed that show very much.''

Two of the problems Mamelak often sees are sleep apnea and periodic leg movements in sleep (PLMS). The former can be treated with a flow of air to keep the throat open and prevent interruptions in breathing.

In PLMS, the sleeper kicks or jerks his or her legs regularly during sleep. This also leads to night time waking and prevents refreshing sleep. It can be treated with a drug that is normally used in Parkinson's disease.

''It's a real puzzle,'' Mamelak said of PLMS. ''But we know it's just as common as sleep apnea.''

He is not an advocate of the school that says if you are having trouble sleeping you should get up, go into another room and read or watch TV. It's more important, he said, to establish a regular sleep routine.

Though sleeping pills may be needed at some times, he warns that their efficacy wears off if they are used night after night and they don't actuallly increase real sleeping time by even five minutes. Also they may become addictive. He sadly recalled that he once treated a man who had been taking sleeping pills for 20 years.

He advises seniors ''not to fight old battles'' in their minds when they go to sleep. ''There is enough to worry about without that.''

At the Baycrest program, he said, an increasing problem is dealing with people who sleep too much.

As for the problem of snoring and its effect on sleep, Mamelak said weight loss is a good way to cure it because it may be caused by tissue laxity. ''Snoring runs in families,'' he added.

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer Fred M. Catzman has been researching their origins over the past few years. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

TARTICK

Tartak is Polish for sawmill. It is also the name of a village. While the surname may derive from either of the above, it definitely has no connection with Antartic.

Bloor JCC holds cabaret in an effort to reduce mortgage

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Top Canadian entertainers kicked off a Bloor Jewish Community Centre (JCC) fundraising campaign with a cabaret-style show.

The campaign is to reduce the centre's $3-million mortgage, acquired when it separated from the Bathurst Street Jewish Community Centre, which went into receivership last August.

The cabaret performers — all are JCC members — included film and TV actor Don Franks; songwriter-satirist Nancy White; actress and singer Theresa Tova; comedian David Gale, creator of Chutzpah a Go-Go; singers Marie-Lynn Hammond and Jay Jackson; and Take Three, an R&B group that does most of its rehearsing in the shvitz.

The sold-out show, attended by 350 people, was the brainchild of Hammond. She told The CJN the cabaret "was meant to be a moral booster to raise the profile of the Y."

An 18-year JCC member, Hammond said she volunteered to organize the show not just to get a reduction on her health club membership, but because she's attached to the place. "This community centre is part of my life, she said. "I had to ask myself, 'If it vanished, how would I feel?' "

The centre needs to raise $5 million over the next three years, said centre director Bill Emery. "First and foremost we have to reduce the mortgage."

A task force committee is overseeing a restructuring plan to help the Bloor JCC better serve the downtown Jewish Community, Emery said. "The goal is to make an independent JCC which is part of the Federation of the Greater Toronto area."

CJN Yom Ha'atzmaut Contest

The CJN's Yom Ha'atzmaut contest is co-sponsored by the Embassy of Israel. We are asking students in junior high and high schools to submit an essay on the subject of: What Israel means to me.

Who can enter:
Students from grades 7 - 13 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

How to enter:
Students may submit only one entry each. We would prefer typewritten entries if possible. The submissions must be between 500 - 600 words.

The judges will choose one of the submissions from the junior high entrants and one from the high school entrants.

Please send us your name, address, phone number, school and grade along with your submission.

You may mail or deliver your submission to:
CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 10 Gateway Blvd., Suite 420, Don Mills, Ontario, M3C 3A1. If you want us to return the essay to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5:00 pm on April 24th, 1995.

Prizes:
The "winning" submissions will be published in The CJN Yom Ha'atzmaut issue. In addition, each of the "winners" will receive from Israel's Ambassador Itzhak Shelef a personal congratulatory letter in a special envelope commemorating the signing of the 1994 Israeli - Jordanian Peace Agreement and a cheque for $100.00.

We will undoubtedly receive many worthy submissions. But only two will be chosen for publication. The judges' decisions will be final. The odds of winning depend upon the number and the quality of submissions received.

How the winners will be notified:
The students whose submissions are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of the Shabbat on Friday, April 28, 1995.

When the prizes will be awarded:
The winning submissions will be published in The CJN of May 4, 1995.

We hope the contest stimulates original, imaginative and possibly, even inspiring thinking. Good luck!!!.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Regie des Loteries et courses du Quebec.

It is my opinion that parents should not leave children unattended unless there is a responsible individual who has been trained to deal with emergencies left in charge. The age that such an individual must be is not specified anywhere in the law or in insurance policies.

However, it appears that parents' conduct could lead to charges under a provincial child welfare statute if the child left behind has a pattern of irresponsible conduct, being someone who the parents should clearly not have left in charge. Maturity appears to be more important than the actual age of the child. At the same time, age obviously is an important factor and there seems to be a consensus among informed authorities that no child under the age of 11 years old should be left alone to supervise other children. Between the ages of 11 and 16, the answer to the question depends very much on the circumstances of each case.

If the authorities arrive because of some incident, then in determining what is "reasonable in the circumstances", many questions have to be answered: How many children were left alone? How old were the younger children? Have there been previous incidents or problems? Does the child in charge have a background under the Young Offenders Act or under the Criminal Code? Did the parents leave a number where they could be reached easily? Was the home stocked with food? Were the children's diapers changed? Was the home in good repair and orderly?

Assuming that all of these questions receive positive and satisfactory answers, it is unlikely that police would charge a parent under a provincial statute for leaving the child alone for a few hours if they were aged anywhere between 11 and 16 years of age. However, depending upon the seriousness of the incident and how scared the children were, the police will usually attempt to contact the parents and insist that they return home immediately.

It is also unlikely that such parents would be charged under the Criminal Code, unless they did something that put the children's safety at immediate risk.

Building nation's future with caring and courage

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

Helen Lieberman

TORONTO — An illegal act by a South African Jewish woman some 25 years ago changed her life forever, as it did for those she helped as a result.

Then a young speech therapist at a Cape Town hospital, Helen Lieberman went to check on a black child after surgery, and discovered he had been discharged. Lieberman was certain the child would die without follow-up care.

So Lieberman traveled to the sprawling black township of Langa, near Cape Town — then illegal under the apartheid regime — to find the mother and child. She discovered them, like hundreds of thousands of other blacks, in a shack made of rusted, corrugated iron with no floor, and a toilet shared with over 100 others. She was appalled by the experience but in the process, she also found a calling.

Today, Lieberman is the driving force behind Ikamva Labantu (The Future of our Nation), a massive safety net of nearly 500 projects aimed at helping South Africa's most disenfranchised people help themselves.

In a society where more than 60 per cent of adult blacks are said to be illiterate and have had little or no vocational training; where one-third of non-white children are not in school; where unemployment in some townships approaches 90 per cent; and where non-whites have generally come to expect virtually no social services from the government, Ikamva Labantu has become a godsend for the teeming black townships and squatter camps that have yet to reap the benefits of the end of apartheid.

Lieberman and her thousands of volunteers, white and black, have spent years working with township leaders — especially women.

The fruits of that labor are seen in five job training centres for adults and older adolescents; adult education in health care, nutrition and things like sewing and brick laying; facilities for emotionally and physically challenged adults; two smaller units for children; four senior citizens centres; classes for some 10,000 pre-schoolers; several youth and community facilities; and over 150 day-care centres.

Users of the services pay what they can, while facilities are stripped down. The umbrella organization survives on an annual budget of between $250,000 and $300,000 (US), which comes from private foundations and foreign governments.

"Every project in the townships is community-owned," the soft-spoken yet steely-eyed Lieberman told The CJN while on a recent swing through Toronto for a series of interviews and lectures. "There's been a wonderful change in human relations in South Africa. I feel it."

But with the country's non-whites holding out rising expectations from the government of President Nelson Mandela, Lieberman cautions that real change is far off.

"The reorganization of the whole infrastructure will take a long, long time. South Africa has changed [but] there's been little or no physical change [since Mandela assumed power]. One infrastructure that is still in place is the civil service, and that has to be changed drastically."

Lieberman recalls that at the beginning of her crusade, the only way whites could legally enter the townships was if they were clergy. So the woman raised in a Jewish family got some basic training in Calvinism and some Bibles, and went in as a "preacher." She was thrown out several times, but returned day after day — initially using her own money to repair buildings — because conditions "were so horrible, so terrible, I can't describe them. Tuberculosis was rampant. I'm still amazed [residents] survived."

Lieberman then borrowed a truck and began hauling food and supplies to the townships, a direct violation of law. "I knew at the time that what I was doing was right." Would she do it again today? "I don't know if I would have the courage," she sighs.

Meanwhile, Lieberman encountered (and still does) stiff resistance from friends, relatives and neighbors. Privately, she concedes that many in South Africa's mostly comfortable Jewish community of 80,000 "sat on the fence" when it came to apartheid. "They should have done more. But like all whites, Jews felt threatened and were afraid of violence. They worried about what would be, and turned inward."

Throughout, Ikamva Labantu has been driven by the old philosophy of teaching someone how to fish, versus giving them fish. "The whole purpose has been to make people self-sufficient," she says.

Today, Lieberman confesses to being exhausted. "I know I can't carry on forever. It will be for another few years. My success will come when I know I am no longer needed."

Jewish Dateline closes doors after 11 years

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As of March 31, there will be one less place to find your beshert.

Jewish Dateline, Toronto's community-supported introduction service, is folding because of budget cutbacks.

Lack of new clients and a drop in renewals, coupled with the general squeeze in funding, are responsible, says Dateline director Debbie Cowitz, the community's official shadchan since 1986.

Founded in 1984 to counter rising intermarriage rates in Metro Toronto, Dateline has brought together about 3,000 people over the years and resulted, Cowitz beams, in over 80 marriages and "lots of Jewish babies."

The service last year ran a deficit of $15,000. About one-third of its $74,000 budget came from Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, with an $11,000 grant from Jewish Family & Child Service, which oversaw operations.

"I'm very sad," Cowitz told The CJN. "But we're going out proud of what we accomplished."

The 1991 federal census showed there were over 22,000 "unattached" Jewish adults in the Toronto area. They can now turn to the roughly half-dozen private dating services which cater to the Jewish community, Cowitz noted.

Debbie Cowitz

Cowitz said she never tired of bringing together never-marrieds, widows, widowers and the divorced. Her philosophy has been "a lid for every pot." Clients came from throughout southern Ontario and as far as New York state.

Their ages ranged from 21 on up. The "oldest" marriage was between a 68-year-old bride and her 71-year-old groom.

She also had to fight the stigma attached to a dating service. "There was nothing wrong in coming here. There were no losers here."

Dateline's approach was scientific. Clients paid an annual fee and filled out a questionnaire that gauged attitudes on everything from children and pets to smoking and keeping kosher.

A computer was then used to suggest pairings, but it was usually Cowitz's finely-honed sixth sense that knew when two people would click.

The service's clients are invited to a goodbye bash on March 29 at the Leah Posluns Theatre at 7:30 p.m. Cowitz, ever the matchmaker, says everyone should attend because "you never know who you'll meet there."

Cultural differences slow Ethiopian integration

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Six hundred Ethiopians made aliyah in 1994 under Israel's family reunification program, but thousands of Ethiopian olim are still separated from close family members whose status as Jews was questioned during Operation Solomon.

That's according to Avraham Neguise, co-ordinator of South Wing to Zion, an organization devoted to bringing 20,000 Falashmura to Israel.

Neguise spoke at Beth Tzedec Congregation, with sponsorship from Beth Tzedec, Holy Blossom Temple and the New Israel Fund (NIF), which supports South Wing.

When the Israeli government opened a consulate in the Ethiopian capital of Addis Ababa in 1990, Neguise said, representatives determined that some Ethiopians — the Falashmura — had willingly converted to Christianity and so were ineligible to enter Israel under the Law of Return.

The Ethiopian community in Israel, however, regards the Falashmura as Jews who drifted away from traditional Jewish communities and adopted customs of the mainstream culture.

"We are pursuing our government to facilitate their immigration under family reunification," Neguise said.

As a result, the Israeli government recently decided to raise its quota of Ethiopians allowed to enter Israel from 100 a month to 200, but the plan has yet to be implemented.

Neguise's talk included a videotape documenting both the extreme poverty of the 4,000 Falashmura living in a camp in Addis Ababa, and their enthusiastic return to Judaism.

Extreme poverty

While Israeli society has been hospitable to Ethiopian Jews, Neguise said olim are having some difficulty integrating because of their cultural differences.

Ethiopians, he said, experience severe culture shock.

"Coming from a traditional society to a modern, technological society, it's always very hard. Our community has paid high psychological prices, even more than the average immigrant."

In Ethiopia, parents are the centre of the family, he said, while Israeli families are child-centred. With children learning Hebrew quicker than their parents, they translate for their parents and become the family's leaders. "This always brings a conflict and a challenge to the family. What South Wing to Zion is doing is trying to educate the family to accept the reality in the situation."

Noting that more than half of the 46,000-member community are without permanent accommodation, Neguise said Ethiopian villagers could build their huts on any available land in the countryside.

"In Israel, when we come to the families and say 'Take a $100,000 mortgage to buy an apartment,' people get shocked."

With the help of Shatil ("seedling" in English), a NIF supported project for volunteer organizations, South Wing to Zion is training leaders in the Ethiopian community to help residents of absorption centres find permanent housing.

Until this year Ethiopians could not marry unless they went through a "symbolic" conversion, said Neguise, but under pressure from the community, the chief rabbinate appointed eight rabbis who may conduct marriage ceremonies without demanding conversion.

The employment rate in the Ethiopian community is high, he reported, with 85 per cent of those capable of working holding jobs, although the work they do usually requires little education.

While Ethiopians want their children to attend university, Neguise said the majority are unable to help them with their homework. "We want to create after-school programs to help these children. We want our children to be doctors, lawyers, professors, so it will give them a good future, status and respected work in the community."

Health care project launched

VANCOUVER — The Louis Brier Home and Hospital for Jewish elderly will participate in a provincial government project to deliver health care services to the culturally diverse comunities of the Lower Mainland.

The aim of the $300,000 project, said the premier, "is to develop a framework for integrating multicultural needs into the provision of quality health care for British Columbia."

Twenty-two health care agencies are involved and each will work within existing budgets to support staff involvement. Mount Saint John Hospital, which is coordinating the program, will provide office space, furnishings and computer and phone access to the project office.

The project will involve training and evaluation of hospital and health facility. On completion of the project, results will be distributed to other health care providers.

Baycrest... Imagine Our Future Without It

Meet Our Campaign Leadership

Nine co-chairs have agreed to lead our critical fund raising drive.
This prestigious group of community leaders have come to serve Baycrest by different roads.
Some are here because of their parents-parents who were community-minded themselves or parents who became residents. Some felt a need to share their own success and give something back to the Jewish community. Some were drawn to Baycrest for its world-renowned reputation in geriatrics. All nine Co-Chairs have one thing in common - a dedication to improving the quality of life of our elderly and ensuring the future of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

Whether its through time or money, our dedicated campaign leadership team needs your help.
Keep the partnership alive.
Become a Baycrest campaigner.

Join the Baycrest Campaign

For over 75 years, Toronto has earned international acclaim for its determination to ensure the elderly a dignified future.

What began as the city's first Jewish Old Folks Home on Cecil Street became the Baycrest Centre 36 years later. Since then, Toronto and Baycrest have become inseparable partners in improving the quality of life for the elderly through loving care, trend-setting programs and world-recognized research. Our future without Baycrest is inconceivable. Now, Baycrest must step confidently into the next century with facilities that fully meet the needs of the day.

More than 80% of residents at the Jewish Home for the Aged are cognitively impaired in some way. As the elderly live longer, they become more susceptible to disease and disorders that cause cognitive damage. That's why we're building a new 372 bed Jewish Home for the Aged and an innovative 100 bed Centre for Cognitive Disorders at the existing campus. The new JHA, with larger rooms, wider hallways, more activity space and dining facilities on each floor, will assist people with illnesses such as Alzheimer's Disease.

The Centre for Cognitive Disorders will care for those whose cognitive abilities have been damaged by medical events such as stroke. Quality of life means more than the construction of a new JHA. Enriching the lives of our elderly is the thread that runs through the fabric that is Baycrest. To meet these needs, we must expand the number of researchers and scientists working in the area of cognitive disorders, so that we can apply the knowledge we have gained directly to the problems of aging and caring for the elderly.

Campaign funds will also be used to establish programs in areas such as rehabilitation, family support services and education. By educating our staff, we support our families; by supporting our families, we meet the needs of all the elderly; and that brings us full circle to providing the best care and quality of life. And that's something we can all be proud of.

Making Your Future Better: The Campaign for Baycrest

New Jewish Home for the Aged & Centre for Cognitive Disorders	$31 million*
Research	$15 million
Rehabilitation	$ 5 million
Community Outreach	$ 5 million
Education	$ 4 million
CAMPAIGN TOTAL	$60 MILLION

*(campaign funds will be combined with capital contributions from the Ontario Ministry of Health and the City of North York to build the Home, which has a total building cost of approximately $65 million)

The Baycrest Builders

Our $60 million campaign is off to an exceptional start, thanks to Barry and Honey Sherman of Apotex Inc.

We also extend our gratitude to Wilfred Posluns and family, Julia and Henry Koschitzky, Mira and Saul Koschitzky, the Goldstein family, Sydney Cooper and family, Baycrest's Leadership Development Group, Men's Service Group and Women's Auxiliary for their generous commitment early in the Campaign.

Barry and Honey Sherman

Imagine Our Future Without It

Since 1981 the number of Toronto residents over 75 has increased by nearly 50%. Half the people now living in the Home are Holocaust survivors and in many cases, they need special care and understanding. The trend toward longer lifespans will continue. It is our job to help Baycrest gaurantee that long life, dignity and quality of life go together.

Maybe it will be your mother or your father.
Maybe it will be your wife or husband.
Maybe it will be you.
At some point in your life, you will need Baycrest.
At this point in your life, Baycrest needs you.

Teen has 'special' bar mitzvah with zayde

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Michael Klasner had three Torah readings for his bar mitzvah, one with 100 Israeli orphans and one at Jerusalem's Great Synagogue, but the most poignant was with his grandfather, Holocaust survivor Joseph Klasner, in Toronto's Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

The simchah was extra special because Joseph Klasner never had a bar mitzvah. He was living in hiding in Poland when he was 13.

"Most people don't get a second chance, but my zayde did and I am honored to share my bar mitzvah with him," Michael said.

Born in Dzialoszyce, a small shtetl 50 kilometres south of Krakow, Joseph was sent into hiding when the Nazis invaded Poland in 1939. He was 10. His parents believed that as the oldest of five children, he had the best chance of surviving. He was the only one in his family to survive the war.

He hid in a barn with his aunt and uncle. When he went back to look for his family, he found only his father. Their house had been looted and was occupied by a Polish family.

Shared simchah

Back in hiding, with their money gone, the four were promised by the Poles who hid them they would be moved to a safer place. They were delivered to the Germans instead. Their protectors had turned them in for a sack of sugar.

The Germans loaded Joseph and his relatives onto a transport bound for Auschwitz. His father pulled away the barbed wire at the window of the box car with his bare hands and pushed his son out, ordering him to run and hide. He never saw his family again.

Joseph worked for a while in Oskar Schindler's Plasow work camp, and in Prokochim, where he worked despite typhus. He escaped again but ended the war in Mauthausen concentration camp. He came to Canada in 1950.

Joseph told the 125 bnei mitzvah guests that his belated bar mitzvah was "one of the most important days of my life."

With wife Katie, Joseph had two children. Their son Jerry is Michael's father.

"Sharing in today's ceremonies with my firstborn grandson is one of those emotional moments in one's life when memories of the past and hardships endured meld into the excitement of this young man's beginnings," Joseph told those assembled.

Halifax doctor retires after 46 years in practice

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritime Correspondent

HALIFAX — Nearly 50 years after starting his gynecology and obstetrics practise in Halifax, Irving Perlin has retired quietly, as is his nature.

But many of his patients — he has delivered close to 10,000 Nova Scotians in his 46-year career — won't allow his retirement to remove him from their thoughts and affections. They have started an Irving Perlin Scholarship to promote research and education in obstetrics.

"I'm honored they would think to do this," Perlin said with typical modesty. "I did the job I was supposed to do and don't feel people should be obligated."

Being a caring doctor wasn't Perlin's only forte. Like every Jewish boy raised in Cape Breton from the early 1920s through the mid-1960s, Perlin learned Hebrew, the order of Shabbat and holiday services and the cantorial trop from Rabbi Isaac Kenner. He became part-time cantor of Shaar Shalom Synagogue in Halifax when the congregation formed in 1954 and, still blessed with a fine tenor voice, continues to hold that part-time position.

But he is better known to the wider Halifax-Dartmouth community as a man who has devoted his life to bringing children into this world.

Born in 1920, Perlin said he wanted to go into medicine from the time he was a teenager at Sydney Academy. The son of a peddlar who came to Sydney from Eastern Europe prior to World War I and later opened a corner grocery-confectionary store, Perlin graduated from Dalhousie University Medical School in 1943.

He served two years overseas in World War II and came home thinking orthopedics might be his field, but quickly turned back to his first love, obstetrics and gynecology. He was certified in 1949.

"In the first few years, I practised alone so I took no holidays at all. Later on, I would trade time with other doctors and more recently, was part of a group practice where other doctors were there to cover."

Since his early days in practise, Perlin has always lived in Halifax's south end. "I wanted to be close to the Grace Maternity Hospital and can recall many occasions walking through snow storms to get to the hospital."

One of his more intriguing deliveries occured when a patient, not his, started giving birth in a hospital elevator. "It must have looked odd to see me on my kness when the elevator door opened," he laughed.

On another ocasion, he climbed to the top floor of a multi-storey apartment building and delivered the first boy to a family of 12 girls. "It was a very exciting time for everyone," he said.

Most of his deliveries, however, he considers routine, although he understands the pain and discomfort a woman experiences is not.

"An obstetrician has to be a caring individual, one who recognizes the other person's feelings as much as possible," he said.

And, he said, "you have to have an understanding and supportive wife. I couldn't have been away from home as much without Freida there to look after things."

Technology has changed since Perlin started practising 46 years ago. Labor has been eased somewhat with the use of painkilling drugs. Ultrasound and better diagnostic methods are also a plus.

"But one thing that hasn't changed is that babies still come out the same way they used to," he smiled.

Jewish charities get bequest from Christian businessman

By STEPHANIE CHAPMAN
CJN Correspondent

HALIBURTON — Four individual bequests totalling $20,000 were left by a recently deceased Minden resident. John Birmingham, a Christian, died on Oct. 11 last year. He was 85 years old.

"Mr. Birmingham was a lovely person who was adamant in his belief that the Jewish people were God's chosen race," said Glenda Burk, the executor of the will. "He knew he wanted to leave money to the Jewish community but he didn't know to which charities he would leave the funds."

Burk, a legal secretary, befriended Birmingham several years prior to his death. "He left it to me to divide the money," she said, adding that Birmingham wanted the funds to go to aid Jewish children and families.

Consequently, it was suggested by Burk and approved by Birmingham that $5,000 payments would be given to the following four groups: the Reena Foundation, Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, Jewish Family and Child Service and United Jewish Appeal.

Donald Finn, Birmingham's lawyer said the charities involved were notified of the bequest by the public trustee.

Birmingham, a Canadian-born factory worker, lived in Toronto until he relocated to a small apartment in Minden, Ont., about seven years ago.

"He didn't believe in television," Burk said.

Although his eyesight was poor, Birmingham subscribed to a number of Christian magazines and he spent Sunday mornings listening to The People's Gospel Hour with Pastor Perry Rockwood, a religious radio broadcast from Nova Scotia.

"He kept pretty much to himself," Burk said, adding that relations with his two sisters were such that the three didn't have much contact.

"He was a quiet man and he had an almost negative side to him but his faith was strong in his mind." Burk said he had no children and his wife had predeceased him.

JFGT hires first central campus services director

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A major step in the restructuring of Toronto Jewish campus organizations has been taken with the hiring of a director of central campus services, the city's first.

Manchester native Zac Kaye, 47, will fill the newly created position May 1. He is currently executive director of Vancouver's B'nai Brith Hillel Foundation.

The Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, which hired Kaye, is in the process of creating an umbrella campus agency. Kaye will be responsible for the Jewish Student Federation at York University, the Jewish Student Union (JSU) at the University of Toronto, and the Jewish Student Council serving Ryerson Polytechnic University, Seneca College, U of T's Scarborough campus and York's Glendon campus.

The campus groups will retain their individual structures and will continue to have their own programming co-ordinators. Current JSU director Rabbi Michael Skobac will serve as chaplain for all three campuses.

As part of the plan, which has been in the works for over two years, federation has committed to increase the joint campus budget by $140,000, to just over $400,000 for the 1995-96 year.

One of Kaye's first tasks will be to set up a centrally located office, or as he put it, "to find a tent and pitch it somewhere."

His relaxed manner belies the serious issues underscoring his work. Jewish continuity, the buzzword of North American Jewry for the past several years, is a top concern.

Zac Kaye

Over 20 years experience

"It's very challenging [work] because of the informality," Kaye said during a recent interview at federation offices. "You really have to extend yourself. You have to be a role model, teacher, 'rabbi,' and counsellor."

Kaye, a teacher by profession, has over 20 years of experience in Jewish community work. He is considered "one of the leading professionals in terms of campus activities," said Morris Zbar, federation's director of community planning and allocations.

Following the completion of his MA in the Jewish Communal Service program at Brandeis University in 1982, Kaye worked for five years in Australia as Hillel director of New South Wales before moving to Vancouver. He also has Jewish community work experience in Israel, his home from 1978 to 1980, and in England.

Kaye relishes a challenge, and Toronto poses a number of them, among them the large number of commuter students and the city's size.

"You have to use the city to your advantage," said Kaye, who would like to bring activities off campus.

Kaye, like a growing number of his North American counterparts, believes in reaching out to both Jewish organizations and high school students. He pioneered major high school outreach programs in England and Australia; their importance was reinforced for him when a former day school student told him in Vancouver she wouldn't go "anywhere near Hillel" because she'd had enough of the atmosphere.

"If that girl had been reached out to [in high school], maybe she wouldn't be as negative. If she'd had the opportunity to vent some of her anger, maybe she would have felt differently."

Programs must reflect students' needs

Some students prefer not to identify with Jewish campus groups because of a longstanding "image problem," Kaye said. "Is Hillel for Nerds?" was the subject of a nine-page article in last month's issue of Moment magazine, he pointed out.

Successful programming has to reflect the needs of students who have a variety of interests and religious backgrounds, Kaye said. An observant Jew, Kaye makes a point of noting in his resume his "respect for the pluralism of contemporary Jewish life." Making everyone feel welcome is part of his work philosophy, he said.

He estimates there are between 8,000 and 10,000 Jewish students and faculty members on Toronto campuses. Most of them are not involved with the campus organizations. "That's an enormous challenge," he said.

USDS founder celebrates his 90th birthday

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Successful businessman and community leader Ellis I. Shapiro recently spent his 90th birthday surrounded by family and friends.

Shapiro, founder of the United Synagogue Day School and Jewish community day camps, welcomed guests to the Pompano Beach, Fla., celebration.

Granddaughter Michelle Glassman-Feldman told The CJN Shapiro is "known by his family as a superman and a '90s kind of guy."

Shapiro plays golf several times a week, "and can equate mathematical problems faster than you or I could punch them into a calculator," she said.

Born on Simcoe Street, he attended Niagara Street Public School and the Central High School of Commerce in Toronto. He established a manufacturing business, Dominion Gasket Mfg. Co. Ltd., and in 1934 married Fanny Enushevsky.

Shapiro was a driving force behind the development of Jewish community camps. He served as the president of the YM-YWHA, forerunner to today's Jewish Community Centre, chairman of the Jewish Camp Council, and is credited with the purchase of their camp site in Haliburton.

He was also one of the founders of the United Synagogue Day School and was president of Beth Tzedec Synagogue.

"On his 90th birthday," said Jack Orenstein, executive vice-president of Beth Tzedec, "all those who have known and worked with him pray that Litch will enjoy many more years of health, years in which he will shep naches from his children and grandchildren, and from the synagogue that he loves with all his heart."

Toronto community leader, Ellis Shapiro (centre) is seen with his children, Elaine Glassman and Barry Shapiro at his 90th birthday celebration in Florida.

New Bonds campaign aimed at teens, parents

TORONTO — State of Israel Bonds will launch the Reach Out Campaign, which plans to increase awareness of State of Israel Bonds in the community with special emphasis on reaching teenaged children and their parents.

The program is co-chaired by David Markowitz and Henry Morton.

"Children should be introduced early to the significance of bonds," says Markowitz. "Bond purchases, or gifts of bonds, are the perfect opportunity for children to begin an interest bearing investment account, and at the same time strengthen their connection to Israel at a young age. These investments are a very special link between our children and their Jewish heritage."

State of Israel bonds have just made investment in Israel a little easier with the introduction of a new $100 (US) simchah gift certificate. This non-interest bearing certificate matures in five years, or can be cashed for shekels in Israel after a minimum of one year.

David Markowitz

"Gift certificates are the stepping stone towards investment in Israel ... In addition, gift certificates, along with Israel Bonds, can help offset their expenses when travelling to Israel," says Markowitz.

Each child of bar or bat mitzvah age will receive a congratulatory letter from the consul general of Israel. When the child makes an investment in Israel by purchasing a bond they will be presented with recognition from State of Israel Bonds during the bar or bat mitzvah weekend.

"Israel Bond purchaes should not be restricted to the High Holy-Days," says Morton. "Bonds can be purchased for simchahs year round.

Henry Morton

"Families get a better rate of return by investing bar and bat mitzvah funds into an Israel Savings Bond at four per cent, compared to a regular savings account at any bank," he says.

The campaign also plans to emphasize the benefit of Israel Bonds by distributing educational material to the Hebrew school and religious school curriculum of Toronto in addition to synagogues and major Jewish organizations.

Israel Bonds are expected to contribute nearly $10 billion over the next decade towards massive infrastructure and high technology development projects. Currently, bonds are helping to finance job training programs for tens of thousands of new immigrants.

Two Israelis killed in bus attack

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Two Israelis were killed and five wounded last Sunday night, when terrorists ambushed a bus travelling from the West Bank settlement of Kiryat Arba to Jerusalem.

Israel Radio reported that gunmen overtook an Egged bus outside Hebron and sprayed the bus with gunfire.

No group claimed responsibility for the attack, which took place about 8 p.m. local time, but officials reportedly believe hardline Palestinians were involved.

In response to the attack, Israeli settlers reportedly ransacked several Palestinian shops in Hebron before the Israeli army imposed a curfew and began searching for the attackers.

The attack came after several weeks of quiet and after Israeli and Palestinian negotiators reported progress in their efforts to expand Palestinian autonomy in the West Bank.

The Israeli government had been gradually easing the closure imposed in the wake of the January suicide bombing in Beit Lid. On Sunday, officials announced that 3,000 more Palestinians would be issued entry permits to work in Israel. That brings the total number of workers allowed in from the territories to 25,000.

Also Sunday, Israeli police reportedly found the bodies of two Arabs who were killed in an explosion near the West Bank town of Jenin.

The authorities said the two had apparently been building a bomb that went off prematurely.

Increase peace talks King Hassan says

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — As the Middle East peace process continues to move in fits and starts, a key supporter, King Hassan II of Morocco, brought his vision of Middle East peace to U.S. President Bill Clinton earlier this month.

The peace process is stalling because it is not a full-fledged peace yet, Hassan said in his welcoming remarks at the White House.

"Peace hasn't taken place in all areas of interest," Hassan said through an interpreter. "For peace to be achieved, the pace of the negotiations between the Palestinians and the Israelis needs to be accelerated away from any equivocations liable to cause the peace process to falter."

Hassan's visit also focused on strengthening Moroccan-U.S. economic ties, the Arab boycott of Israel, negotiations between Israel and Syria and the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

The boycott is an important issue for the peace process, said Hassan, whose country has taken significant steps to ease its own boycott of Israel.

"We are not looking into the peace process without looking into the economic peace process also," he said.

SS captain to be extradited

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUENOS AIRES — Argentine officials have promised to extradite to Italy a former Nazi SS captain involved in the massacre of 335 Italian civilians.

In a meeting last week, President Carlos Menem assured Tommy Baer, president of B'nai B'rith International, that 82-year old Erich Priebke would be "on his way to Italy by the end of the month," a spokesperson for Baer said.

Italian news reports quoted a spokesman for Menem as saying the March 31 deadline was "very probable."

Priebke was tracked down in Argentina last year during an investigation by ABC Television's PrimeTime Live. After the program, officials placed Priebke under house arrest and the Italian government began extradition proceedings.

Reform rabbis gather in Israel

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — "If, in the new Middle East, Israel can recognize the PLO, then it should be able to recognize Reform Judaism," said Rabbi Amiel Hirsch, at the recent international convention of Reform rabbis.

Rabbi Hirsch, who heads Artza, the Reform movement's Zionist organization, was one of 300 participants at the Central Conference of American Rabbis (CCAR), which meets in Israel every seven years.

The priorities of the gathering, which was attended by a number of leading Canadian Reform rabbis, were to push for religious pluralism in Israel and to forge a working vision of Reform Zionism for the 21st century.

Israeli leaders who addressed the convention showed little sympathy for the Reform movement's call for religious pluralism in Israel. Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin did not relate to the issue at all. Opposition leader Binyamin Netanyahu, who was sharply criticized by ultra-Orthodox leaders for addressing the Reform rabbis, said he favored the continuation of the status quo in religious affairs.

"For us, the status quo means severe discrimination," said Rabbi Hirsch, in response.

Reform, Conservative and Reconstructionist rabbis have no religious authority in Israel; marriages and other ceremonies they perform are not recognized by the Rabbinate. The movements also maintain that the Israeli government discriminates against them in funding.

To combat this, the CCAR has launched Operation Equality, a campaign to raise $2 million to underwrite the pursuit of religious rights in Israel.

CCAR launches Operation Equality

"The Israeli secular leadership doesn't understand how serious an issue this is for us, because they don't take religion seriously," Rabbi Michael Stroh of Toronto's Temple Har Zion told The CJN. "But religious pluralism is as fundamental a right as freedom of speech. It is not something we can compromise on — not even for the sake of peace," he said.

"Strangely enough, the openness that is being shown towards us in our relations with the Vatican is not paralleled in our attempts to deal healingly with our brothers here," said Rabbi Jordan Pearlson of Toronto's Temple Sinai.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut of Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple was less equivocal. "I think we ought to say openly and forcefully that pluralism is, as far as we are concerned, the desirable mode for Israel," he said.

One highlight of the conference — a co-ed prayer service at the Southern Wall of the Old City — passed quietly despite anticipated trouble. Past prayer services led by women at the Western Wall have sparked protests and even violence from ultra-Orthodox demonstrators. The Rabbinate, which has no jurisdiction over the nearby Southern Wall, did nothing to interfere with the service held there.

Rabbi Pearlson said he hopes all Jews will be able to pray at the Western Wall in the future.

"Given the length of the wall, there are possibilities for variant forms of prayer to take place side by side — and these should be allowed despite the overt contempt of those who disagree," he said.

During the convention, Toronto Rabbi Dov Marmur unveiled a draft of a proposed platform for Reform Zionism. Calling it a historic document, he said the CCAR-initiated project would be presented in its final form by 1997 to mark the first centennial of the Zionist movement.

"The time has long passed for the ritual of breastbeating for our earlier sins of omission," said Rabbi Marmur, referring to the Reform movement's initial rejection of Zionism. "Today our involvement in Israel is the greatest challenge the Reform movement faces. It is also a true test of Reform, in that it changes its emphasis in order to respond to historic reality."

The document, drafted by an ad hoc committee that included Rabbi Marmur, affirmed the centrality of Israel in Jewish life, called for enhancing the presence of Reform Judaism in Israel and proposed that Diaspora Jews consider the option of "partial" aliyah.

"We are realistic and acknowledge that at present only a minority of our people will choose to observe the mitzvah of aliyah fully. We therefore offer several suggestions as to how it can be fulfilled partially," Rabbi Marmur explained.

The document also proposed a new relationship between Israel and the Diaspora based on equality and mutual respect.

The final version will constitute the fourth major platform of Reform since the movement adopted its first platform in 1885.

Hebrew language's beauty flows throughout land

By EMILY HAUSER

You may very well have studied Hebrew at some point, but did your dictionaries feature words such as "blyn-deight" (n: romantic outing for two people who had never met previously)? How about "soo-pear-mo-dell" (n; well-known and top-level model, synonyms, see Cindy Crawford)? Pupils may not learn words like this in the average ulpan, but Hebrew-speaking Israelis use them all the time. My, my. What would Eliezer Ben-Yehuda say?

THE TEXTURE OF LIFE IN ISRAEL

Linguistic genius Ben-Yehuda reinvented Hebrew as a modern, spoken tongue; a labor of love and not a little insanity, his contribution to the third Jewish Commonwealth can be heard on the streets of Israel everyday. The language is beautiful, powerful and resonates with the ages. And it exists in a vacuum.

Only Israeli Jews (and, it must be noted, Arabs) speak Hebrew on a daily basis — five million people at most, many of whom speak something else altogether at home. The other 99.9 per cent of humanity speaks many other things, and for better or worse, the dominant culture in the world is American. Perhaps it should come as no surprise then that the language is rife with bastardizations of English and American concepts.

This is especially so among the young and trendy. As the self-designated representatives of all things hip. Tel Aviv's weekly newspapers (the rough equivalent of the Village Voice) are replete with words that would have Ben-Yehuda flummoxed. A radio personality gives an interview and confides that he is worried that his foray into television will be a "flohp" (flop); a column towards the back of one paper tells the readers where they can order food "taik-a-whey" (take-away); a two-column wide headline begs the question. "Wot ells eez nu?" (What else is new?). English words like "supermarket," "classy," and "pub" have been in circulation for so long that they're virtually considered to be Hebrew.

Such corruptions of the language tend to get the nation's intelligentsia into a flap on a regular basis. The best example can be found in the to-do some months ago surrounding an Education Ministry plan to develop a new study program in some schools in which a few of the classes are taught in English.

The idea first caught the public eye last summer, when it was incorrectly reported as the intention to establish schools with English as the language of instruction. At the time, the Hebrew Language Academy had a collective fit. The body's scientific secretary told the press: "We are calling an emergency meeting to raise a warning cry against the Education Ministry's strange and saddening decision." Members of the academy who were vacationing abroad were told to return to Israel to face off with the ministry. Within days the plan was returned to a back burner — not canceled, officials explained. but still "under consideration," where it remains until today.

Ironically, the issue was eventually debated by Education's chief inspector for English studies and a member of the academy — in English, during an English-language broadcast on the Voice of Israel. Judy Steiner explained that the whole program was experimental in nature, had been misrepresnted and would involve at most two to three subjects in a given school's curriculum, classes along the lines of music, physical education or crafts — nothing terribly weighty. One could hear the wind whoosing out of academy member Avi Avners' sails.

In impeccable English, Avner opened with a warning that once you start teaching non-English subjects in the language, it won't stay there. There is a certain momentum to these things," he cautioned, but was quickly reduced to criticizing the ministry for allowing the "popularization" of English, insisting that a second language must be taught through great literature. "There's a problem with the secondary schools in general," he said, "a problem of culture."

And that is the crux. The Hebrew language and its daily use as the national tongue of the Jewish state hasn't been endangered. What is under threat is the dearly held notion — held by the nation's founders and their children, today's older generation — that Israel will be a high-brow light unto the nations. This same view led the government to deny the country television until 1970. It was David Ben-Gurion's reason for refusing to allow the Beatles to play Israel.

Yes, Hebrew is spoken incorrectly by a disconcerting number of well-educated people, and it is sometimes hard to figure out just what the Tel Aviv weeklies are talking about. But this is normal. Ben-Gurion is famous for having wanted a country for his people in which both the policeman and the thieves would be Jewish; the invasion of Americanized English into Hebrew is the linguistic equivalent of Yiddishe catburglers, for better or for worse.

I lean towards "better." Israel, once a weak, fledgling country under siege, no longer has to carefully watch all its sides and continue to insist that it exists to anyone who will listen. We're here, and we're not going anywhere. The squads of school children who used to harass people in the 1930s and 40s for daring to use anything other than Hebrew in their daily transactions are no longer necessary. There are now millions of people who have never thought in any other language, and Hebrew no longer needs a guard dog. Isn't that glorious? We are normal — high-brow, low-brow and everything in between. That's what we wanted all along.

emigres from the Soviet republics were using the Jewish state as a stepping stone to the West.

Israel continues to say that claims by Soviet olim of harassment and persecution are spurious.

Canada, in effect, has told Israel to mind its own business.

Some estimates put the total number of Israelis seeking refugee status in Canada at 2,000.

"Canada is the only country in the world which recognizes refugees from Israel," Itzhak Shelef, Israel's ambassador to Canada, told The CJN last week after reviewing the latest figures.

He attributed the increase in the acceptance level to "the failure of the IRB to understand that Israel is a democratic, lawful country [and] a society that does not produce refugees.

"I hope that with more information, they will understand. Israel will continue explaining this. Even one [successful claimant] is too many."

Typically, claimants allege that in Israel they were subjected to harassment, threats, mistreatment of children, job discrimination, even rape and beatings by police because of mixed marriages or questionable status as Jews.

Those who succeed in their claims, like all other refugees, have managed to convince the IRB they had a well-founded fear of persecution in their last country of citizenship.

Israel has estimated that about one-third of all olim from the Soviet republics are non-Jewish according to Halachah (meaning they had non-Jewish mothers). Nevertheless, they have been able to prove at least one Jewish grandparent — all that is needed to obtain Israeli citizenship under the country's Law of Return.

In a landmark decision last year, the Federal Court of Canada upheld an IRB ruling which had denied refugee status to a family that immigrated to Israel from Kazakhstan.

The family claimed it had been persecuted in Israel because of its mixed status. But the court ruled that discrimination — if there had been any — did not amount to persecution.

The court added there was "no evidence that [the Israeli government] is persecuting those persons who they have invited to come to their country."

Susan Davis, national director of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS), told The CJN that in the past, the majority of successful claims from Israel have been granted in Quebec.

She said there is "a very different culture operating" at Montreal IRB panels than those elsewhere, but stopped short of calling Quebec panels anti-Israel.

Also last week, two former IRB members told a parliamentary committee that the board is incompetent and incapable of screening out criminals, terrorists and fraudulent claims.

The former members said some applicants tailor their claims to match guidelines available at any refugee board office.

Shelef and Davis said there are plenty of immigration "consultants" in Israel who specialize in Canada.

David Matas, president of the Canadian Council for Refugees, last week countered that only 38 people out of 122,000 have defrauded the IRB in the last five years.

Matas based his study on the number of times between 1989 and 1994 in which the IRB stripped refugees of their status after finding out they had misled the board.

Sri Lanka, Somalia and Iran topped the IRB list of source countries for refugees last year. Israel was eighth overall, sandwiched between Pakistan and Haiti.

Helms lashes out at Syria

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

WASHINGTON — Powerful U.S. Senate Foreign Relations Committee chairman Jesse Helms has again lashed out at Syria, saying he doubts it would respect a peace treaty with Israel, and adding that Damascus stands no chance of receiving U.S. financial aid.

Helms's statements came in a letter sent last week to MK Avigdor Kahalani, who earlier met with Helms's foreign policy aides during a visit to Capitol Hill. Kahalani released the letter to Israeli journalists here.

Acknowledging that only Israelis must decide on a Golan Heights-for-peace deal, Helms wrote: "The U.S. should make no attempt to provide sweeteners in order to induce Syria or Israel to make concessions. This certainly includes the Clinton administration's promise of U.S. troops on the Golan, which I am persuaded would be a mistake.

"Insofar as Syria is highly unlikely to abide by a peace agreement, American troops could easily be caught in the middle of renewed violence between Syria and Israel. Furthermore, our troops might become targets of terrorist attacks from southern Lebanon, a terrorist stronghold."

Bronfman showdown averted

U.S. oil company cancels billion-dollar Iran deal

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Under the threat of a U.S presidential order and dissent within its own parent company, Conoco, a major American oil company, has canceled a $1-billion deal with Iran.

The move drew praise from Jewish groups and averted an anticipated showdown between Edgar Bronfman and the board of directors of Du Pont, Conoco's parent company.

Bronfman, along with his brother Charles and son Edgar, holds a controlling interest in the Seagram's company, which owns 24.3 per cent of Du Pont.

Bronfman, a leading Jewish philanthropist and president of the World Jewish Congress, stood to gain hundreds of millions of dollars from the deal. Instead, he led the charge to scuttle the agreement on Capitol Hill.

In visits to Capitol Hill last week, Bronfman had signalled he would do everything he could to block the deal when it came before the Du Pont board, according to legislative aides who attended the meetings. Sources close to Bronfman said if "push came to shove, he had the support" to kill the deal.

As Clinton was poised to sign an executive order banning U.S. companies from entering into contracts for the financing, supervision or management of oil development projects in Iran, Conoco announced it would abandon its deal signed March 6.

Under the agreement, the Houston-based oil company was to have built two off-shore rigs and natural gas lines for Iran. The company stood to gain $1 billion from the deal.

According to Capitol Hill staffers, Bronfman told senior House and Senate leaders that he is "unequivocally opposed" to the deal with a "rogue, terrorist state." Bronfman reportedly was trying to persuade members of Congress to pass legislation banning other American companies from stepping in with the National Iranian Oil Company.

"Du Pont and Conoco pride themselves on being good corporate citizens in the United States as well as around the world," the company said in a statement. "As a result, Conoco will not proceed with the agreement."

Young talent agency owner has her future all mapped out

By MOURA WOLPERT
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Too young at 14 to get a job, Sarah Freeman went into business for herself, painting anything from murals at Parkview High School in Dundas to a cat shelter in Toronto.

Now, six years later, she's the owner of Freeman Talent Associates Ltd., a flourishing agency that's doing so well, she's just opened an office in Toronto.

Within the year she hopes to open an office in Vancouver and by the end of 1995, in Montreal and Los Angeles as well.

Meanwhile, she's also reading scripts in preparation for the production company she plans to have one day.

Sarah Freeman has her future all mapped out — and the determination to make it happen.

Born in Toronto, the daughter of lawyer David Freeman and Paula Willinsky, she has lived in Dundas since she was 8. She took her last year of high school in Nice, spent the summer travelling, then studied at the Dundas Valley School of Art for three years.

She was also acting, both here and in Toronto, and doing some modelling.

Originally she wanted to be an actress but to succeed, she said in a recent interview, "you've got to be very, very hungry for it." Freeman realized she wasn't hungry enough.

Sarah Freeman

But the business side of the industry interested her. When the agency she was working for went bankrupt, she bought it with the help of her father and her stepfather, Richard Sniderman of Dundas.

When we met at the old house that serves as both office and home, Sarah said she has 400 clients on her books and both offices are "flooded with calls."

Clients of all ages, from a few weeks to 87 years, all hope for work as extras or actors in commercials, movies, TV series or theatre.

Basic pay for an extra is $7.15 per hour, which goes up with specific skills, location work and for speaking parts and major roles.

Prospective clients must provide a portfolio of 8 by 10-inch glossy photos in a variety of moods and poses, which are then circulated and matched with casting directors' requirements.

Business in 1994 was unbelievably good, Freeman said, and with the combination of the low Canadian dollar and Toronto's reputation as a city that can easily double for almost any in the United States, the outlook for 1995 promises to be even better.

Her agency represents people from all over Ontario. Among recent film and television credits are The Santa Claus; The Ref; Road to Avonlea; Street Legal and Boogie's Diner, while she has done TV commercials for companies such as Kellog's, Toyota, Bell Canada, Labatt's and Molson.

Credibility key to getting credit

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — It's not easy for fledgling entrepreneurs to get credit, but paying bills on time is the first step to building one's reputation and credibility, an expert on credit and collections told participants at a recent seminar sponsored by the YMCA Enterprise Centre, Jobs Ontario Self-employment training program.

Business consultant Helen Rubinoff, who has more than 14 years of credit management experience with Silverwood's Dairies, Federal Express, Nestle and Maple Leaf Foods, had practical tips on giving and getting credit to the 11 seminar participants, all of whom have started or are about to start their own businesses.

Novice entrepreneurs should not be discouraged if they get turned down for credit, Rubinoff said. She advised them to focus on building credibility in the eyes of suppliers.

Applicants for a line of credit with a bank will have more success if the business plan includes a strategy for collections, she said.

For those whose businesses will lend credit, Rubinoff advises writing out agreements which specify their customers' credit limits and time frames for payment. She suggested a COD-type payment would be the most worthwhile for small businesses.

But before that, the business would need information about the customer and his or her company. Forming "strategic alliances" with other, non-competing companies who deal with the same customers can often be the best and cheapest way of finding out how these customers pays their bills, Rubinoff said.

Business operators should exercise caution with customers who break credit agreements, she said. "They [customers] have to start proving themselves early in the game."

Tips from The Pros

Imagine: You've just purchased a house and you're all set to move in. To your surprise the previous owner hasn't left by the agreed closing time. As Toronto lawyer Edwin Durbin illustrates the legal term "vacant possession" can have different interpretations.

By EDWIN DURBIN
Special to The CJN

In a real estate transaction, the agreement of purchase and sale typically states that "the purchaser is entitled to vacant possession of the property upon completion." In other words, there must be no one living on the property when the deal closes.

Vacant possession has many meanings

What happens if the vendor has not vacated the premises at the scheduled closing time? The consequences depend on what the purchaser is trying to accomplish.

In Cooper v. Mysak (1986), the purchaser looked for a "legal way" out of a deal. Although he had agreed to purchase a building, his plans changed and he no longer wanted it. At the scheduled closing time of 4:00 p.m., the tenant was still occupying the premises.

The purchaser's lawyer tried to take advantage of this situation by refusing to close because the vendor could not "give vacant possession" at that time.

When the vendor sued for breach of contract, the court decided in her favor. Because the purchase agreement did not specify the exact time the building had to be vacated, the vendor was allowed to vacate any time before midnight on the closing day.

In Foord v. Smith (1993), the issue was whether the purchaser could require the vendor to assume costs for delaying his entry.

In this case, the lawyers closed the transaction in the registry office at 4:24 p.m., but the purchaser's movers were not allowed access to the house at 6 p.m. because the vendors had not yet moved out. The movers left and returned several days later, billing the purchaser for the additional trip. The purchaser sued the vendors to recover the extra moving costs.

The vendors argued that they were entitled to occupy the house until midnight of the closing date. This argument was rejected. The court ordered the vendor to pay the purchaser's extra costs because the purchaser was entitled to possession of the house immediately upon completion of the transaction.

These decisions indicate that interpretation of the same words can be different, depending on the question to be decided.

Russian cards access machines

TEL AVIV — An agreement was signed recently by Russian and Israeli financial institutions to allow over 100,000 holders of the STB plastic card, Russia's first and largest credit card system, to have access to 324 ATM machines at Bank Hapoalim group locations throughout Israel for withdrawals in New Israeli Shekels (NIS). The cash machines will respond to STB cardholders in the Russian language.

These STB cards may also be used by Russian tourists and businessmen visiting Israel to obtain U.S. dollars at three central branches of Bank Hapoalim, in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and Haifa. The agreement does not cover the use of STB cards at commercial points of sale in Israel.

STB cards are issued by more than 160 Russian banks, as well as credit companies in Latvia and Ukraine.

Israeli diamond industry expands

RAMAT-GAN, Israel — The Israel diamond industry is making a strong start in 1995 with expanded diamond sales predicted on a worldwide basis.

In the first two months of the year Israeli exports of cut diamonds reached $728 million (US), 24 per cent more than the $587 million in 1994, when the Israel industry had record sales of $3.5 billion. A striking 66 per cent increase in gross exports to a surprisingly strong Japanese market in January and February — $158 million compared to $95 million the first two months of last year — combined with continually rising imports by the United States, is putting glitter in the diamond business outlook.

Alan Newton Real Estate

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — State of the art technology helps keep Alan Newton Real Estate's 80 sales agents up to date and in constant touch with their clients.

"With our fully computerized system we don't have to worry about message papers or wait for agents to call in. Everyone is on a pager; so as soon as a call is received, the message is typed into a computer and received by the agent within minutes. When there is anything new to report we can send out a group page. An agent is always on hand that way," says Alan Newton.

He adds that office computers also record all transactions, from the minute a property is listed until it closes.

"Everything is on computer — which agents are working on a sale, expenses incurred and any change in price. This allows for quicker and more up-to-date information and it is also easier to follow-up on past clients. The computers are automatically programmed to remind agents of the anniversary dates of their sales."

Newton says that sales staff in the agency's apartment division use laptop computers when presenting a property to clients.

"This division, manned by three agents, opened in 1990 and currently has 24 apartment buildings listed throughout the city and surrounding towns. All necessary statistics are on computer and clients come away from a meeting with a full understanding of such things as what the income from the building will be for up to five years, as well as the income from each apartment. That way, they really know what they are looking for."

He says that the residential division, with properties listed all over Toronto but predominantly in the northern part of North York, Thornhill and southern Richmond Hill, had its best spring in five years.

"Prices have levelled off and there has been a marginal increase. I believe that the bad times are behind us and that prices will come back. This is probably the best time in the last five years to buy a property."

Newton's advice to potential buyers is to work with an agent who knows the area. "Someone who is not fully conversant in a desired area could miss the perfect home."

He discourages people from selling privately because vendors are not always available to show their home and they are not able to follow up potential buyers. "Over 90 per cent of private vendors end up listing their homes with an agency," he says.

He cites efficiency, good management and easy accessibility as some of the reasons for his agency's success.

"We run a weekly training seminar featuring selling and listing techniques. My job is to work with the salespeople, and I leave all the paperwork to an office administrator. There are few offices in which the manager or owner is free to work full time with the sales staff. Most of my agents have years of experience. Many have been in this office for nine or 10 years and some have 20 years experience in the field.

"Another factor behind our success is that we have something for everyone. There are properties listed from $180,000 to $5 million and each buyer gets the same treatment, regardless of income or price range."

Newton, who has been in the business for 15 years and has had his own agency for 11 years, says an agent should never stop learning.

"I believe that we learn something every day. I am constantly reading industry books on the economy and on selling techniques. The most important thing in any profession is to continue to learn and to have an open mind."

What Do Jews Believe: The Spiritual Foundations of Judaism by David S. Ariel Random House of Canada $35.00

Sigmund Freud once cautioned a Jewish colleague, who was thinking of raising his children outside of the Jewish community, with these words: "If you do not let your son grow up as a Jew, you will deprive him of those sources of energy which cannot be replaced by anything else. He will have to struggle as a Jew and you ought to help him develop all the energy he will need for that struggle. Do not deprive him of that advantage."

The author of this valuable guide to the convictions and vision of Judaism is convinced that the many-sided struggle to remain a Jew is essential because Judaism represents a serious and sustained effort to address human concerns with a distinctive and unique system of values. He emphasized that Judaism is the longest continuous tradition in Western civilization to ask fundamental questions about the purpose of life and human destiny.

In a word, what most distinguishes Judaism is its unending quest for finding a transcendent purpose for human existence. He quotes from a letter by a Jewish mother to her child living in the Warsaw ghetto in 1940, shortly before they were murdered by the Nazis: "Judaism, my child, is the struggle to bring down God upon earth, a struggle for the sanctification of the human heart. This struggle your people wages not with physical force but with spirit and by constant striving for truth and justice. So, do you understand, my child how we are distinct from others and wherein lies the secret of our existence on earth?

In this well-informed and thoughtful study the author, president of the Cleveland College of Jewish Studies, expounds on the abiding elements of Jewish belief: God, human destiny, good and evil, the chosen people, the meaning of Torah, the mitzvot, prayer and the Messiah.

The author has no ideological investment in any form of Judaism and the reader is impartially informed about the basic and major tenets of all the wings in modern Judaism. This sweeping and eclectic approach enables him to call upon such diverse personalities as Maimonides, Leo Baeck, Martin Buber, Samson Raphael Hirsch, Abraham Heschel, Franz Rosenzweig and the Baal Shem Tov.

In discussing the quest for spirituality in Chassidism, the author affirms that every human being has a vocation in life, a specific and unique calling. Thus, the world needs each and every person because his or her mission is to create something perfect in this world.

A poignant chapter in the book involves the author's letter to his children, based on the Jewish tradition of the ethical will. He exhorts them to carry on the traditions of their fathers, both for their own sakes and for the continuing contribution that Judaism makes to world culture.

"If Jews do not care about Judaism, who will? And if Jews cease to be Jews, who will represent this vision of a higher purpose of life to the world? But the real answer to the question 'Why be Jewish?' has to do with you. If you choose to disregard your Jewish heritage, you will lose something that cannot be replaced by anything else."

This stimulating and useful volume is highly recommended. It offers guidance and orientation within the rich and complex world of Jewish thought.

Rikudiyah Festival draws 400 kids

By ROSE TOGMAN HEILBRONN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — More than 400 children from Hebrew day schools and Jewish community centres in Toronto, Hamilton and Kingston recently danced in the 25th annual Rikudiyah at York University.

They opened the 1½-hour program with a rendition of Haben Yakir Lee Ephraim. Choreographed by festival director Teme Kernerman, the dance is based on Jeremiah's prophecy that God's children will return to their land.

"The dances, based on biblical quotations, traditional prayer and modern Hebrew songs, reflect Israel's aspirations for peace," she said.

In addition to seven fully choreographed dances, the children learned Hevenu Shalom Alechem on the spot, as Kerneman instructed from the centre of the room.

A special feature of the festival was the presentation by the Chai Dancers, the performing dance group from the Senior Adult Services Department of the Bathurst Jewish Centre. The group was created by Kerneman 16 years ago.

The afternoon's two other guest performance groups from the Bialik Hebrew Day Schools danced in bright colorful costumes.

In his opening remarks, Rabbi Irwin Witty, executive director of the Board of Jewish Education, paid tribute to festival director and award-winning choreographer Kerneman, who pioneered Rikudiyah in a small room at the Bathurst Jewish Centre with 40 children.

"In some families," said Kerneman, "three generations have danced with me."

The Rikudiyah was co-sponsored by the Koffler Centre of the Arts, the Bathurst Jewish Centre and the Toronto Board of Jewish Education.

A whale of a show

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A new musical coming to town promises to be a whale of a show.

Jonah, an original children's musical based on the biblical story of Jonah and the whale, is being produced by the Beth Tzedec Youth program.

The show premiers at Beth Tzedec March 29 at 7 p.m. A portion of the proceeds will go to the Reena Foundation.

Ari Kaplan, a first-year law student, co-wrote Jonah two years ago with screenwriter and actor Elliott Hurst. Kaplan told The CJN that the show, which combines the theme of repentance and teshuvah, is filled with unusual, humorous characters to allow students to have fun and learn about their heritage at the same time.

Kaplan, with Jonah director Ruth Rumack, started the Beth Tzedec youth drama program last fall. Program participants chose to put on Jonah. "They really liked the idea of bringing something original to the stage," Kaplan said. "They feel like they're creating something new and fresh."

Rehearsals have been held twice a week since February. CHAT Grade 12 student Darren Kagel will perform the music live, and Andrew Rosen of the Canadian Film Centre will take care of lighting and sets as the show's art director.

The eight-member cast, all students of United Synagogue Day Schools Bathurst campus, are 11 to 13 years old. The lead, 13-year-old Darrah Teitel, has studied drama at both Young People's Theatre and the Lean Posluns Centre.

The whole cast is enthusiastic. Liora Norwich, 13, said "I like seeing how it's all being put together. How it started with a script and it's grown into songs and characters."

Artist's work pokes fun at the world of international business

By
ROSE TOGMAN HEILBRONN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Gary Silverberg, one of Canada's leading contemporary artists, reaches out to the business world in his current show, Reactionism '95: It's a Business World, After All.

In his exhibition at Toronto's Gallery One, Silverberg satirizes the world of international business.

In Out of Reach, a businessman's contorted body is upside down. His mouth, the only feature on his face, is wide in rage. Fury is in his clenched hands. What is out of reach is a deal.

"Business is our culture," Silverberg says. "Business is unifying the world."

He fills almost all of his 17 oil paintings on canvas with instantly recognizable icons of this culture: credit cards, share certificates, telephone cards and travellers' cheques.

In Fearless Leadership, the leader's featureless face is in a cloud, surrounded by a halo of electric lights. This heavenly figure speaks to our view of corporate heroes and the false messiahs of the real estate industry in the past five years.

Silverberg, 39, is an insider in both the business and art worlds. For the past 18 years, the native Torontonian has been a successful real estate developer.

While a student at York University in the '70s, he was one of the founders of the Reaction Movement in which the artist depicts events in his own life.

Since graduating in 1977, Silverberg has continued to paint, mounting two sold-out shows based on business themes in 1991 and 1993.

The emotions in Silverberg's boardrooms are anger and anguish. Faces portray the panic of deadlines or the frenzy of negotiations. "Everyone is anxious," he says.

Bold, bright colors and large, stretching figures make the paintings uplifting. No one wallows in defeat in Silverberg's world, which is also charged with energy and humor.

His humor is tinged with cynicism, however, as he compares business to religion with In Business We Trust; to sports in Pre-Negotiation Work Up; and to show business with 11 Dancing Stars.

Even in this exhibition, Silverberg is the perfect blend of businessman and artist. Taking a cue from the Barnes Exhibit, he has incorporated a souvenir shop into the show.

Among items for sale are ties, silk screened with one of six pictures from his last show. Attached to each tie is one of Silverberg's quotations about the corporate world.

The show's opening on March 7 attracted more than 200 guests. It runs until March 29.

Anne Frank documentary airing on WTN

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

On the 50th anniversary of her death in Bergen-Belsen at age 15, the Women's Television Network (WTN) is presenting an award-winning documentary on Anne Frank.

The film, The Last Seven Months of Anne Frank, will be broadcast on March 27 at 9 p.m.

Immediately afterward, WTN will screen another documentary about the Holocaust in Holland, Married With A Star.

Both films are directed by Willy Lindwer. The first won an International Emmy Award in 1988.

The Last Seven Months of Anne Frank begins where her diary ended in August 1944. In that fateful year, Anne and her family were arrested and placed on the last transport of Dutch Jews from the Westerbork holding camp to Auschwitz, which, together with Sobibor, devoured some 100,000 Dutch Jews.

Sharing Anne's fate were eight Dutch Jewish women who knew her in the final months of her life. Among them is her closest childhood friend, Lies Goosens. Their memories help create a poignant cinematic document.

Married With A Star is based on a fragment from a grainy home movie of a Jewish wedding in Nazi-occupied Amsterdam in March 1942.

When they met, Clara was 19 and Max 25. The wedding, someone speculates, was a "desperate attempt" on their part to maintain a facade of normalcy under great duress.

Some smile, others are dour. Nearly everyone at the wedding, including the cantor and the rabbi, were murdered by the Nazis.

Married With A Star is a fine documentary, but it's marred by a translator's voiceover which often renders the soundtrack almost unintelligible.

Play Reading at Bloor JCC: After 10 years of research, writing and rewriting, Beth Kaplan hopes the upcoming public reading of her play, Gordin in America, about the Yiddish playwright Jacob Gordin, will restore his reputation, demolished in a long-forgotten ideological feud.

The play, co-winner of the 1994 Canadian Jewish Playwriting Contest, is set to be premiered in a staged reading at the Bloor JCC (750 Spadina Ave., Toronto) on Sunday April 2 at 8 p.m., under the direction of Corinne Copnick. Admission is $5.

Kaplan, a great-granddaughter of Gordin, was drawn to his story because so little was known about him even within her own family. What she discovered both surprised and angered her.

"What infuriated me was that his reputation was demolished by a campaign of deliberate and calculated vilification waged against him by Abraham Kahan, the editor of the Forward, the leading Jewish journal of its time," she says. "In fact, he was a great idealist, a passionate advocate of social change, a model for his time, and for our self-centred time, too."

Toronto Mayor Barbara Hall bestowed various civic awards upon numerous accomplished Torontonians earlier this month at Toronto City Hall. Rhona Mickelson, founder of Star Tracks talent agency, was one of seven people to receive awards of merit for improving the city's quality of life.

Mickelson, a paraplegic since age three, studied film at university and noticed while on a movie set one day that able-bodied actors were given crutches and wheelchairs so they could portray people with disabilities. Why can't they use authentically disabled people to play these roles? Mickelson thought.

Star Tracks, which she established seven years ago, now has 50 clients with different talents and different disabilities. Mickelson, who does not charge any commission or fee to represent them, runs the agency from her home, and offers free weekly training workshops on acting and modelling.

Others to receive awards were Jane Beecroft, Paul Beeston, Terry Costaris, Diane Dupuy, J. Fraser Mustard and Harvey Perrin.

The mayor also bestowed the William P. Hubbard Race Relations Award to artist-musician Mendelson Joe and racial harmony pioneer J. Gerald Rose. A singer, songwriter and painter, Mendelson Joe has promoted racial harmony in songs, paintings and articles in newspapers and magazines.

Friend of Yiddish: Harvey Atkin, one of Canada's most familiar commercial voices and television faces, has become honorary chair of the Committee for Yiddish Studies at the University of Toronto.

Harvey Atkin

The voice of Leon's Furniture commercials and a regular on the former Cagney and Lacey television series, Atkin says he looks on the chair-person's role as honoring his grandmother and grandfather who nurtured his love of Yiddish.

In this, Atkin takes his cue from these words from Isaac Bashevis Singer's Nobel acceptance speech: "Yiddish has not yet said its last word. It comprises treasures which have not yet been revealed to the eyes of the world."

To reveal those treasures, "a proper academic stage has to be set, says Atkin. "The Yiddish courses offered at the U of T, as part of the Jewish Studies Program, open up for students the opportunity to learn in a disciplined manner. My hope is that these students will in turn become teachers and enthusiasts who create new treasures in Yiddish."

Each performance runs 3 p.m. to 10:30 p.m. with a dinner break and several intermissions. 905-773-4750.

People Mover a convenient way to tour Detroit

By STEPHANIE CHAPMAN
CJN Correspondent

DETROIT — I was not looking particularly forward to spending the day in Detroit by myself while my companions attended an annual convention, when I spotted the People Mover.

Essentially, this is Detroit's answer to the Toronto subway — a mini-system, but nonetheless an effective way to hit all the downtown sights.

Cavalcade of Cars

The four-car transit system has 13 stops, and at 50 cents per person, the ride is worth every U.S. penny if you want to see a good mix of historical and modern sights.

First stop is Times Square, where Detroit's first street railway tracks were laid in 1863. An organized tour of the People Mover is available here.

Michigan Avenue

If you have a nose for news, the Fort/Cass Station is the stop you'll want. The Detroit Free Press, the Detroit News and WDIV-Channel 4 are located here. It should be noted that the Free Press, housed in an impressive historical building, was the first Michigan newspaper to have a full-time correspondent during the Civil War.

The Cobo Centre Station, named for former Detroit mayor Albert E. Cobo (1950-57) who was heralded for his financial reforms, takes visitors to one of America's premier convention centres. It's worth hopping off the train just to take a look at the size of the centre. While you're there, make sure you take a look at the massive statue of Joe Louis in the main foyer.

The Joe Louis Arena Station is next. It was named after the "Brown Bomber," who was the 1937 world heavyweight boxing champion.

The next four stops — Financial District Station, Millender Centre Station, Renaissance Centre Station and the Bricktown Station — feature the best in shopping, architecture, antiques, jazzeries and pubs.

This tour will also take you to the Du Mouchelle Art Galleries and the Old Mariner's Church (c. 1849). Seafarers, including those mentioned in Gordon Lightfoot's classic ballad The Wreck of the Edmund Fitzgerald, are still remembered here.

If you're looking for a lively nightlife, go no further than Greektown Station. Here Trapper Alley, an area that pops with color, is housed in the Traugott Schmidt and Son's fur and leather processing plant (c. 1852). Although I couldn't make this stop at night, one brochure stated that some of the plant's original equipment is still evident in the stores and eateries along the way.

The Cadillac Centre Station will take you to the Downtown Library. On a gruesome note, the last public execution in Michigan (1830) took place on this site.

The last two stops — Broadway Station and the Grand Circus Park Station — will please art buffs. Here, you can visit the local artist community and galleries, and see the alternative theatre and dance companies.

If the destinations are not enough to keep you busy, the stations themselves will keep you occupied until the next train. The Downtown Detroit People Mover Art Commission (also called Art in the Stations) was created to incorporate major works of art into the setting.

Regional, national and international artists were invited to create proposals for each station; tile, mosaic and other durable materials were given preference. Fifteen artists, nine of whom are from Michigan, were selected to bring their designs to life in the stations of the Detroit People Mover.

As a former commuter, my favorite was by Kirk Newman, whose work can be found at the Michigan Station stop. Entitled On the Move, it features 14 humorous figures running to catch the train. Newman's cast bronze shapes give the impression of constant movement, which certainly reflects the action of the commuters.

Another favorite is called the Cavalcade of Cars by Larry Ebel/Linda Cianciolo Scarlett. This mural features seven vintage automobiles in a tribute to Detroit's automobile industry.

Using the People Mover is a convenient way to see downtown Detroit. However, after one whole afternoon on the system, I was only able to investigate three station stops. According to the tourist information available, one stop per day would have been a more realistic pace.

Weak dollar keeps Canadians at home during March Break, Decima poll shows

TORONTO — Only nine per cent of Canadians who took a March Break vacation this year, and one-quarter of those who stayed home say the weak dollar had a major influence on their decision, according to the Decima Quarterly Report released recently.

For the nine per cent who will travel, the United States is the favored destination (39 per cent of those surveyed); 19 per cent will vacation in their home province; 24 per cent will visit another province; and 17 per cent will travel to another destination.

"What's interesting is that 18 to 19-year-olds are more than twice as likely to travel as the general population (21 per cent compared with 9 per cent)," said Marjorie MacPherson of Decima Research. "That age group is also the most likely to travel outside their home province, but stay within Canada, perhaps to visit friends and families. Eighteen per cent of university students say they'll take a trip this March, as do 15 per cent of single Canadians.

Single travelers display a preference for travel outside Canada and the United States (25 per cent), while 48 per cent of married travellers are heading for the United States. "Residents of Quebec and British Columbia are most likely to vacation within their own province — probably on ski vacations," said MacPherson.

A quarter of those not traveling said the low value of the Canadian dollar had a major influence on their decision not to travel this March, and an additional 17 per cent said the dollar was a minor influence on their decision. Overall more than half of Canadians who are not taking March Break vacations say the dollar had no impact on their decision.

Enlarged Jewish Museum inaugurated

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUDAPEST— The rebuilt and newly enlarged building of the Budapest Jewish Museum was inaugurated recently with the opening of a new art exhibition, Victims and Killers.

The art exhibit included drawings by a Hungarian Jewish artist who depicted the Jewish victims of the Budapest ghetto 50 years ago. Another display by a Jewish artist depicts the war-crimes trials of Hungarian Nazis after World War II.

The Budapest Jewish Museum's new building was enlarged by some 780 square feet. The museum, established in 1930, was originally housed in the home where Zionist leader Theodor Herzl was born. The museum, now part of a complex of buildings attached to the Central Dohany Synagogue, will soon include a permanent exhibit on the history of Hungarian Jewry.

The reconstruction of the whole complex now is under way and will be completed by the end of the year if funds promised by the Hungarian government and other donors are soon received, said Gusztav Zoltai, head of the Hungarian Jewish community.

Also on exhibit is the collection of Jewish relics that were stolen from the museum in December 1993. These works of art, valued at $200 million (US), consisted of more than 180 works collected since 1916, including gold and silver religious objects, paintings and carpets. Most of the collection was recovered in Romania in August 1994 as the result of a joint effort of Hungarian, Romanian and Israeli police.

About 90 per cent of the collection has already been returned to Budapest, with some of the pieces remaining in Romania under the control of the police there. Those pieces will be returned to the Budapest Jewish Museum in about two months, said Zoltai.

Travel Talk

by Bill Gladstone

On my first visit to Israel not too many years ago, I approached the Western Wall with awe and trepidation, trying to fathom the passing of two millenia of Jewish history since the destruction of the Second Temple. Transfixed, I stood in a transcendental stupor before this most holy site, my heart filled with reverence, my existence paling into insignificance beside these solemn stones.

Was it my secular garb or perhaps my expression that conveyed to locals that I was a newcomer? Was I wearing the wrong color yalmulke? No matter. With his black coat and scraggly white beard, the bent and elderly man who tapped me on the shoulder looked like a rabbi from another century. Evidently, he was collecting money for something. "Give me a dollar and I'll say a brachah for you," he said.

I confess, I found this commercial proposition inappropriate, considering the location. Why should this self-appointed gatekeeper interpose himself between a visiting Jew and his ancient heritage? "I'll give you two dollars if you leave me alone," I wanted to say. But instead I paid the reverent stranger what he asked and watched as he supplicated the Almighty on my behalf. I made my own prayers afterwards.

A typical street in Old Jerusalem. Circa 1846

It is the supreme privilege and right of North American Jews (as it is of Jews everywhere) to forge a direct and dynamic relationship of their own with the land of Israel. Born in Russia a century ago, my grandfather (may he rest in peace) came to Canada as a boy and prayed continuously for the return to Zion. For most of his life, travel to Israel involved great hardship and prohibitive expense. Only in the age of jet travel, when he was in his 80s, did he finally reach Israel to attend the bar mitvah of a great-grandson at Masada.

For 2,000 years, even as they wept by the waters of Babylon, Jews in every corner of the world have prayed fervently for the return to Jerusalem. Today, we have the luxuries of jet travel and good hotels in all price ranges. We have a cornucopia of organized tours, car rentals, excellent tour guides, wonderful spas and resorts, kibbutz hotels, important museums, all-inclusive Pesach packages.

These days, a trip to Israel is not beyond the budget of most Canadian Jews, yet statistics tell us that only a small percentage of Canadian Jewry make the journey. Those that go, we are informed, make frequent trips. A full 40 per cent of the traffic to Israel consists of people making repeat visits. The average stay is two weeks.

This month, the Israel Government Tourist Office hosted a series of trade shows for travel agents in major cities across Canada. In Toronto, a ballroom of the Park Plaza Hotel was filled with representatives of the many hoteliers, tour operators and other suppliers.

Representatives of Dan and Moriah Hotels were there, as was someone from the Neve Ilan Hotel, a lush hilltop resort north of Jerusalem. Air Canada was promoting its new twice-weekly, non-stop service to Israel, commencing June 20. As well, Air Canada Vacations was publicizing its exciting combinations involving air and car, air and hotels, kibbutz accommodation, motorcoach tours, spa holidays and sidetrips to Jordan.

Other tour operators on hand included Conference Travel and Tours, Canadian Travel Abroad Ltd., Tourcan Vacations, Nordic Tours, Triaena/Poseidon Tours, Dan Tours and Sunworld, whose Mediterranean offerings include an 8-day coach tour of Israel and a specialized tour of the Negev.

Also present was Joanne Cothran from Regent Holidays, who was handing out copies of an attractive 32-page color brochure. Entitled The Many Faces of Israel, it is filled with exciting travel possibilities, including eight touring holidays to Israel, Egypt and Jordan, and a variety of "go-as-you-please" combinations involving car rentals and kibbutz accommodations. City by city, hotel prices are clearly laid out in colorful tables.

Until the jet age, such a wealth of travel opportunities to Israel would have astonished most Jews in Canada. Today, we take such wonders for granted. Brochures on travel to Israel are available individually from each of the above-named companies or by visiting your local travel agent.

The Tradition Continues . . .

Dear Friends,

Well, we've come to that time again, the start of another Passover. For over 60 years now, we've helped customers celebrate Passover with the largest selection of traditional Passover foods. This year, we have more than ever....all under one roof. You'll find our shelves filled with selections of traditional, imported, specialty and convenience foods, beverages and household products -- more than 2000 Kosher for Passover products in all!

For me, Passover is an exciting time. Sons, daughters, grandchildren together again, sharing festive traditions that other families have celebrated for hundreds of years before ours. This rich tradition produces more happiness, love and sense of belonging for my family than anything else I can imagine.

So, please enjoy this Passover Guide, we hope it helps you get started with your holiday planning. And, on behalf of the Goodbaum family, I send along sincere wishes for a happy, healthy and harmonius Passover.

Yours truly,
Julius Goodbaum
President

Support dropping for PLO talks: poll

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin said last Sunday he is "not one bit sorry" for branding the opposition Likud "an accomplice" to Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu countered that "Rabin has evidently ceased to function as a prime minister. Instead of assuming responsibility for government policies and unifying the nation, he seems bent on ripping it apart."

Meanwhile, a poll released Sunday showed that if elections were held now, Netanyahu would win with 60 per cent of the vote.

The latest furor was kindled by a television interview in which Rabin repeatedly said the Likud is an accomplice to Islamic terrorists.

As the war of words continued, the gloom in Labor party ranks was underscored by the findings of a survey carried out by the Jaffee Centre for Strategic Studies at Tel Aviv University.

The poll, which surveyed over 1,000 adult Jewish urban dwellers earlier this year, showed that Israelis are more concerned about their personal safety than a year ago.

While a majority of the population favors continuing negotiations with the PLO, the number dropped from 60 per cent in 1994 to 53 per cent.

Twenty-nine per cent felt the PLO is able to contain terrorism, compared to 35 per cent last year.

The poll found that 36 per cent of respondents were opposed to the Oslo peace accords, an increase over a year ago of four percentage points.

Ottawa to name war crime suspects

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Federal officials are expected to announce this week that another Metro Toronto man will be accused of Nazi-era war crimes.

The naming of the suspect, along with a Metro man already battling allegations that he took part in the killing of Jews in Nazi-occupied Latvia, represents Canada's newest tactic in hunting down war criminals: attempting denaturalization and deportation, instead of criminal prosecution.

Federal officials say a third suspected war criminal is to be named next week, while a fourth suspect, also from the Toronto area, will face an inquiry before the Immigration and Refugee Board because he is not a citizen.

Earlier this year, Justice Minister Alan Rock said war crimes investigators have evidence against 12 suspects but will pursue these four cases first, a move seen as a test of the legal waters.

The flurry of activity in the past 10 days came at the same time as revelations that Canadian officials knew as far back as 1966 that suspected Nazi war criminal Erichs Tobiass was living in Metro Toronto.

Canadian Jewish Congress last week released a copy of a letter written June 13, 1966 by the Vienna-based Nazi hunter Simon Wiesenthal to Margaret Meagher, then an official at Canada's embassy in Austria.

The letter says Wiesenthal's office had learned that four men of Latvian origin, who had convinced Canadian officials following World War II that they were legitimate refugees, were living in Ontario.

Included on the list was Tobiass' name and address, along with allegations that are now part of Ottawa's complaint against him.

A day in the life of a social worker

By HARRIET TOBMAN & BARBARA VICTOR

Jewish Family Services of the Baron de Hirsch Institute (JFS) in Montreal is a 132-year-old organization funded by FEDERATION CJA, serving some 1,000 cases a month. It is staffed by 45 full- and part-time social workers. The CJN brings you this look at the problems our family agencies face.

Special to The CJN

8:30 a.m.: Judith arrives at work, picks up her messages and begins her day taking calls.

The first is from Mrs. B., who is anxious about an upcoming child custody hearing. Her children spent the weekend with their father and came home refusing to continue to visit him. They were unhappy because their father paid no attention to them but was focused on his new bride and her children. Judith listens, offers support and makes an appointment to see Mrs. B. within the week.

The next call is from Mr. D., a new client who recently lost his job. He needs information about unemployment insurance and employment counselling. Judith refers him to the unemployment office and to Jewish Vocational Services for job placement.

9:00-11:00 a.m.: Judith has client interviews.

The first is with Mr. and Mrs. G. and their three sons, ages 10, eight and five. The couple have asked for help in handling the boys, who are having difficulty with daily routines like mealtime, bedtime and refusal to do homework. The school is complaining that the 8-year-old is disruptive and the 5-year-old falls asleep in class.

Judith spends an hour helping Mr. and Mrs. G. learn to parent effectively by supporting and reinforcing each other and by using consistently applied expectations and consequences.

The second interview is with Mark, a 16-year-old who is under-achieving in school and showing signs of withdrawal from his friends and family. Mark was referred to the agency by his school principal and has agreed to come once and "check things out."

CANADA

CHRC Report

OTTAWA — Last year was "a mixed bag of positives and negatives," the head of the Canadian Human Rights Commission said last week.

Releasing the commission's annual report for 1994, Max Yalden expressed disappointment at what he called the government's failure to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act.

The report said the most pressing human rights issues in Canada last year were those facing aboriginal peoples.

The commission also expressed concern over racial discrimination and hate propaganda, and stressed its efforts to shut down telephone hate lines.

Klein to Israel

EDMONTON — Alberta Premier Ralph Klein will lead a trade mission to the Middle East this June.

In addition to visiting Israel, Klein will travel to Egypt, Lebanon and Dubai to market Alberta's petrolium know-how to the Arab states and to boost trade with Israel.

At the same time, the Jewish communities of Edmonton and Calgary are planning a UJA mission to Israel, which the premier will join for certain events.

ISRAEL

Suicide Attack Averted

JERUSALEM — Security forces last week headed off a planned suicide attack by seizing a truck laden with explosives in southern Israel.

Police arrested two Palestinians in connection with the vehicle. Both suspects, residents of Gaza City, later told investigators they were planning a suicide bomb attack in Beersheva, using a truck holding several kilos of explosives.

The following day, the government barred the entry of Palestinian vehicles from the Gaza Strip.

PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat condemned the planned attack, but also called for an end to the vehicle ban.

TNT Being Smuggled

JERUSALEM — Tons of the explosive TNT are being smuggled into the Gaza Strip from Egypt and Israel by Israeli citizens, mostly Bedouins, a senior Palestinian Police source said last week.

As well, terrorists supply themselves with an ample number of unexploded shells and mines still strewn about the region, the source said, adding that Palestinian police cannot confiscate such a vast amount of weapons.

Oman Ties Near

JERUSALEM — Israel and the Persian Gulf nation of Oman are close to establishing diplomatic ties, Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin said last week after holding talks with his Omani counterpart in Cairo.

The two reached an agreement in principle to allow El Al to fly over the Gulf Arab state's air space, Beilin said.

He added that Israeli businesspeople would visit Oman in the coming weeks, and that the two countries would cooperate on water desalination projects.

Israel Aids Arab States

JERUSALEM — Israel will expand its growing Third World assistance program to include Jordan, Tunisia, the United Arab Emirates and the Palestinian Authority.

The Mashav program provides mostly technical courses in Israel for Third World officials, in such areas as agriculture, public health, water and science. Last year, officials from 136 countries took part.

Israeli experts also teach about 4,400 trainees in 50 countries and supervise model farms in Egypt and Morocco. There are plans to do the same in Tunisia.

Drug Use Down

JERUSALEM — Drug use in the Israel Defence Force is dropping, the Knesset war on drugs committee was told last week, with only four per cent of soldiers admitting to drug use last year, compared to 10 per cent in 1982.

Smoking Down Too

JERUSALEM — A new survey shows that Israel's smoking rate has dropped from 30 per cent of the population to 26 per cent in just over a year.

Twenty-three per cent of Israeli women smoke, compared with 29 per cent of men.

Six months ago, a law barring smoking in the workplace (except in designated smoking areas) went into effect.

Eban Marks 80th

JERUSALEM — An 80th birthday is as good a time as any for nostalgia, and Israeli statesman Abba Eban had plenty of company for his reminiscences last Wednesday.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin joined a group of Knesset faction heads, former foreign ministers, deputy speakers, and committee heads to mark the milestone.

"The State of Israel never had a better spokesman in the world than Abba Eban," Rabin said.

More Tourists

JERUSALEM — The number of Israelis permitted into Jordan daily has been raised to 900 from 600, the Tourism Ministry announced last Tuesday.

WORLD

Torah Scroll Returned

PRAGUE — Czech President Vaclav Havel recently helped return a repaired Torah scroll to this city's historic Altneuschul synagogue.

Two scribes from Israel repaired the scroll, which had not been mended since 1907.

Accompanying the Torah in a procession to the synagogue were Klezmer musicians, singers and dancers.

Havel said the ceremony reflected the revival of the Jewish community in the Czech Republic.

Jordan Debt Forgiven

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Senate has voted to forgive all of Jordan's remaining debt to the United States by the end of the 1996 fiscal year.

The Senate agreed to include $50 million in debt relief now and an additional $225 million in fiscal year 1996.

On-Line Haggadah

NEW YORK — The Haggadah is now available on the Internet, Chabad-Lubavitch here has announced.

The on-line Haggadah can be accessed at the gopher site (gopher.lubavitch.chabad.org), according to Rabbi Yosef Kazen, director of Chabad Lubavitch in Cyberspace.

According to Rabbi Kazen (yyk@lubavitch.chabad.org) over 1,000 people visit the Chabad Gopher and World Wide Web Sites daily.

Canada to rejoin Pan-Am Maccabi Games

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — For the first time in eight years, Canada will send a contingent of Jewish athletes to the Pan-Am Maccabi Games, next Dec. 25 to Jan. 2 in Buenos Aires.

The last time Canada sent a team to the games — back in 1987 in Caracas — it came back with a slew of medals, even though only 25 athletes took part. Canada also sent teams to Mexico in 1979 and to Brazil in 1983.

Bob Luxenberg, who will be captain of the team, stressed that the Pan-Am games, which will attract about 2,000 athletes in all, are meant primarily as a springboard for talent looking towards the next full-fledged Maccabiah Games in Israel in 1997.

Luxenberg said while the team

will try to bring down "six to eight" top prospects for the 1997 Maccabiah, any "decent" Canadian Jewish athlete who meets a minimum standard can apply to come.

Unlike the Israeli event, the trip to Buenos Aires will not be subsidized by Maccabi Canada.

"These games are a catapult," said Luxenberg, 37, and himself a former Maccabi medal-winning swimmer.

"It is meant to give athletes maybe their first taste of international experience and a flavor of Maccabi competition. They are more developmental than anything else."

Luxenberg expected the team to number from 40 to 50, with competition in the juniors, seniors and masters categories.

The Pan-Am event, held quadrennially and two years after the Israeli games, are primarily intended for countries from the Americas, especially Latin America. But the U.S. team, Luxenberg noted, will number 200, and Israel, Australia and even some European countries are also expected to take part.

Since it will also be summer in Buenos Aires, the competition will reflect it. Canada will send down a softball and rugby-7 team, as well as talent in swimming, golf, tennis, table tennis, wrestling and squash.

Luxenberg, who is also chair of Maccabi Canada's national athletics committee, recalled that several of Canada's top Jewish athletes, such as swimmer Chantal Harrison and runner Joseph Kibur, first made their marks at the Pan-Am Maccabi Games.

In general terms, Luxenberg said that a new sense of purpose has infused the Maccabi Canada organization as it looks toward '97.

The next summer games could also see some changes. Ice hockey and/or figure skating could be included, Luxenberg said, if four countries (Canada and Israel would be two of them) have the talent to send, and if Israel's planned Olympic-sized hockey venue is completed.

CORRECTIONS

In the sidebar to last week's article on the Vigil for Agunot, the item regarding limitations of Canada's Divorce Act was only partially true.

While the law does have limitations, courts are able to apply sanctions against recalcitrant spouses under certain circumstances, even if the couple has a civil divorce. This is particularly true when the divorce decree has called for some form of financial support.

The CJN regrets the error.

WE'RE GETTING AN ATLAS!

In Maurice Lucow's article about the Jewish community of British Columbia and the Northwest Territories, several editing errors were made:

The 1991 census listed the Jewish population of the Lower Mainland. The heading of Vital Signs should have read Northwest and Yukon Territories. Whitehorse is the capital of the Yukon; Yellowknife of the Northwest Territories.

Swastika painted on the walls of Associated Hebrew Schools Finch Avenue campus.

TORONTO — Following three separate anti-Semitic daubings at Jewish schools in Toronto and Winnipeg, school and community officials are making it clear that students should not feel threatened.

"It is not an attack on children," said Canadian Jewish Congress community relations director Bernie Farber in the wake of the March 17-18 incidents at Associated Hebrew Schools' Finch Avenue and Leslie Street campuses.

Foot-high swastikas and "Jews Die" were spray painted in red and black on the two Associated buildings, said Det. Dino Doria of the Metro Toronto Police Hate Crimes Unit. The graffiti were removed before students returned to school that Monday.

Similar slogans were spray painted on Winnipeg's Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate March 1. Police are investigating all three incidents.

"We just gave students clear information and the opportunity to discuss it," said Joseph Wolinsky principal Jerry Cohen. He said none of the 294 students in grades 7 to 12 approached staff with fears of possible violence.

Associated education director Rabbi Abraham Soffer said he has reassured parents and students that the daubings do not pose a threat to the children. "They are well protected," he said.

As for discussion, Rabbi Soffer said the younger students cannot understand, while the older students already learn about anti-Semitism through their Holocaust studies. "This is a place for learning, not a place to cause unnecessary fear," he said.

Toronto Board of Jewish Education director Rabbi Irwin Witty also emphasized the need not to overreact to such acts of vandalism.

"It doesn't mean that the world is being overrun by anti-Semites," he said. "We must simply remain vigilant and continue to mobilize all possible help."

Congress is offering a $5,000 reward for information on the Toronto daubings. Call Congress at 416-635-2883, ext. 186, or Crimestoppers at 416-222-8477.

El Al ordered to honor teen's winning ticket

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A small claims court in Ottawa has ordered El Al to reinstate a ticket to Israel won by a local teenager, then rescinded by the airline.

The court last week ruled that El Al has until June 10 to honor a roundtrip ticket won last year by 12-year-old Ariel Greenbaum-Shinder.

The Ottawa girl, a Grade 7 student at Hillel Academy, was awarded the ticket after winning first prize in last year's United Jewish Appeal Walkathon. She raised $125.

El Al stipulated in a letter last April that the ticket was non-refundable and non-transferable, and had to be used by Dec. 31, 1994.

But Greenbaum-Shinder's father, Jack Shinder, hoped the ticket could be extended in order to take advantage of school holidays later in the year, or that it could be sold.

According to Shinder's testimony, El Al told him the ticket could not be extended until this June — the end of the low season — but that it could be transfered if it did not have a name on it, and that it would be honored by anyone who presented it.

Shinder said the ticket did not have a name on it.

Last October, he received an offer to buy the ticket after he placed an ad in the local Jewish newspaper.

A few days later, Shinder received a letter from the airline cancelling the ticket, stating his attempt to sell it contravened the original agreement.

When Shinder asked for an explanation, he said he was told the matter was closed.

Shinder told The CJN his daughter "is really excited" now that she's going to Israel for the first time. He said the court did not explain its decision.

He said future misunderstandings could be cleared up if El Al simply issued prize tickets in the winner's name.

When contacted by The CJN, Yona Nechustan, El Al's general manager for Canada, said he had no comment on the case.

York students launch AIDS research chapter

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When York University students Lisa Stein and Alina Grinblat organized a fundraising bash for AIDS research last year, the results exceeded all expectations.

On a Saturday evening in January 1994, 1,000 people filled The Opera House, a Queen Street East club catering to the young and hip, to dance the night away to local disco band Chunk o' Funk. The two friends raised close to $10,000 that night for CANFAR (Canadian Foundation for AIDS Research).

Stein, 23, and Grinblat, 22, are best friends from Forest Hill Collegiate Institute. It is easy to mistake them for sisters with their long, dark curls and their habit of finishing each other's sentences.

When Stein first learned of CANFAR through a volunteer, she discussed the dearth of student involvement with Grinblat. Last year they set about establishing Canada's first and only campus CANFAR chapter at York.

Stein, who now volunteers in CANFAR's Toronto office, admits it was hard to organize the first event. "We're not bar people or clubbing people," she said.

"We just learned as we went along," said Grinblat during a recent interview. They spent weeks handing out and posting flyers from the north end of town down to the Queen Street clubs, obtaining corporate sponsors, writing and distributing news releases and tending to countless details.

The threat AIDS poses to their generation motivated their hard work, said Stein.

She was joined for the interview, held prior to this year's benefit, by Grinblat and two other high school friends — Adam Newman and Jay Goldberg — whom they had recruited for this year's organizing committee. The 1995 benefit, at $10 a ticket ($15 at the door) was held on March 18. Over 500 people attended.

Newman, 24, is a student at Osgoode Hall Law School, and Goldberg, also 24, is a recent York graduate and manager at Bregman's bakery-restaurant.

This year's benefit, which went on until about 2 a.m., was again held at The Opera House. Dizzy Spell, a local downtown band, was introduced by Toronto veejay Master T, who also distributed donated raffle prizes.

"People are coming because it's a party," said Goldberg. "The benefit is that we're getting the message of AIDS across subliminally."

"It's opening people's eyes," Newman said.

Partygoers received a tangible reminder about AIDS prevention in the form of condoms donated by Meditrust.

The annual AIDS benefit constitutes the CANFAR campus chapter's main activity. "We hope to make it bigger as the years progress," said Goldberg.

"This is something that's really come from our hearts," said Grinblat.

Anti-racist group leaders meet in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Leaders of four western Canadian anti-racist groups met in Winnipeg on March 11 to plan their strategy for the spring and summer.

Yaron Walter, a son of Holocaust survivors, who represents United Against Racism (UAR), a anti-racist skinhead group in Winnipeg, outlined their program.

"Probably in April, we will have a rally, maybe on Hitler's birthday, with B'nai Brith and other anti-racist groups, to get us started. Then in late June or early July, we are planning an anti-racist youth conference with people from across Canada and the northern United States ... to educate people in dealing with racism. This will be one of the biggest anti-racism conferences ever held in Canada."

The other anti-racist leaders present at the meeting were Allan Dutton, executive-director of the Vancouver-based Canadian Anti-Racism Education and Research Society (CAERS); the Western Anti-Racist Network's Ron Bourgeault of Regina; and Helmut-Harry Loewen of Winnipeg.

Walter predicts a lot of neo-Nazi activity this summer in Winnipeg and across Canada. He reports that there are rumors about a neo-Nazi conference in Winnipeg.

"We can easily move out 200 people within a couple of days to counterattack if need be," Walter says.

The four also held a press conference to outline the activities of right wing racist groups such as the Northern Hammerskins, Ku Klux Klan, Aryan Nations and the Heritage Front in western Canada, and to provide an update on neo-Nazi recruitment and agitation in the west.

They also dealt with the issue of hate group activity in the Canadian Armed Forces and released a copy of a letter they sent to Defence Minister David Collenette, calling for an expanded inquiry into racist activity in the armed forces beyond the disbanded Airborne Regiment. The letter calls on the RCMP and CSIS to become involved in the inquiry.

Bone marrow clinic draws 875 people

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There were people all over the place. They filled the parking lot, jammed the surrounding streets and nearby plaza, and wended their way through baby carriages, knots of determinedly cheerful teenagers and couples grabbing a few minutes from Pesach cleaning.

An astounding 875 people came to the Bnai Brith building in North York to be tested as potential bone marrow donors for New Jersey man Jay Feinberg, who is suffering from chronic myelogenous leukemia. His disease is progressing rapidly, and according to reports from Friends of Jay in New York, he is becoming weaker.

On every side you could hear the whispers — "this is the last chance to find a match for him ... I hope it's not too late ... I had to come ... the last chance."

"Chana kept asking if they have found a match for him," said her mother Susan. "When she heard that they were having another clinic, she was a little scared, but she insisted on being tested. So I gave her my permission.

"Then Shayna wanted to try to help too. So of course I drove her down too."

Sunday's testing was paid for by Barry Sherman of Apotex pharmaceutical company.

Sherman modestly shrugged off compliments and thanks for his generosity, saying, "It just seemed the right thing to do. I had to help."

He was presented with an original painting by artist Dubie Ari by the Jewish Russian Community Centre and Friends of Jay Canada, who had organized the drive along with Jerome Stanleigh, whose son Audi received a bone marrow transplant last summer from a Windsor man originally tested for Feinberg.

The theme of the painting, said presenter Carol Seidman, is the Garden of Eden. "The Garden of Eden," she said, "talks about a better world. These two people [Barry and Honey Sherman] are helping all of us become part of a better world."

Helping Feinberg became a Sherman family affair. Daughter Lauren, a student at the University of Western Ontario, organized a drive there, also paid for by Apotex, which garnered nearly 100 more potential donors.

Apotex director of public and government relations Elie Betito called the response "a tremendous outpouring of love.

"People were still coming at 5. We had to turn some away because we didn't expect so many people and we ran out of testing supplies."

Blood samples were immediately shipped to a lab in the United States for testing. Results are expected in a week to 10 days.

Seniors' advocate dies at age 84

By AMY SATTIN

TORONTO — Seniors advocate Sara Wayman died of cancer in Edmonton March 13. She was 84.

Wayman was a social worker in Toronto, Kingston and Hawkesbury, Ont. and Vancouver and Prince Rupert, B.C. before retiring from the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and joining Canadian Pensioners Concerned, a seniors advocacy group.

Wayman was born in Newcastle-on-Tyne and came to Canada with her family at age 3. She received her undergraduate degree in social work from the University of Toronto and her master's degree from the University of British Columbia.

Former social worker

She worked with children and families before coming to Baycrest in the 1960s. "She was a very committed individual to the old people and their needs," said Sorel Urman, director of client services at Baycrest. "She was a tiny lady but with a real strong zeal to help people to achieve a better quality of life for themselves."

After retiring, Wayman became a board member of Canadian Pensioners Concerned and worked to better long term care in the province. She co-authored How To Choose The Right Place, a booklet on long-term care facilities that was reprinted in 1990.

Neighborly hands

The family is one of the pillars of society and, of course, of Jewish life. In its ideal form, it is founded on love, trust, caring and mutual respect. It supports and protects the individual against the constant battering of everyday strains and stresses. It is also the key medium through which our traditions and our values are transmitted from one generation to the next.

Ironically and unfortunately, modern society, like a constantly beating wind, is chipping away at this precious pillar and eroding its ability to protect individual identity and esteem from this wearying attrition. Sadly, the cumulative effect of these destructive ill winds is an increasing number of families without family support and children without childhood.

In this issue of The CJN, we have attempted to shed a ray of introductory light on some of the problems of the child and the family. We have also published a first hand account of a day in the life of a caseworker at the Jewish Family Services of the Baron de Hirsch Institute in Montreal.

Only someone who has never needed help, never felt shame, never been alone, or never cried the searing tears of grief and failure would fail to understand the significance of the social workers' labor. Day in day out, they respond to the call of the troubled heart, the confused spirit or the broken home. We look to them to protect, and where possible, to restore the worn down pillars on which we place such heavy reliance.

In looking into the world of the social worker through the windowed pane of their clients' problems, we are reminded of an observation written to a friend by Franz Rosenzweig. "None of us has solid ground constantly under his feet; each of us is only held up by the neighborly hands grasping him by the scruff, with the result that we are each held up by the next man, and often, indeed most of the time, hold each other up mutually."

We are grateful for the "neighborly hands" which, in modern times, are often held out by social workers.

Drinking from the Dead Sea

It has been an eventful 14 days for PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat. Two weeks ago in Tunis, at a meeting of the Central Committee of the PLO, he reconfirmed his preference for autocratic rule and government by personality rejecting the call of prominent PLO members to share decision-making powers with them.

Last week he greeted U.S. Vice-President Al Gore in the municipal offices of Jericho. Arafat was said to have promised the vice-president that he would prosecute terrorists. His precise words as reported in the press, were: "Those who will try to jeopardize and harm peace and security will be prosecuted." The statement is hardly a declaration of war on the haters of Israel or on the enemies of the peace process.

Nevertheless, for his promise, the U.S. administration rewarded him with a package of aid valued at $73 million for development and public works in the Gaza Strip. Palestinians will also be authorized to export more than 4,600 agricultural and industrial products from the West Bank and Gaza to the United States duty-free. It was therefore a vague but very profitable promise for the sole ruler.

It is important to note however, before Gore's visit, the chairman addressed a local gathering from the balcony of his office with anti-Israel, inflammatory words. He thus reverted to past form by speaking one way to a Palestinian crowd and another way to a crowd of western leaders. He exhorted the assembly by accusing Israel of a number of violations of the Declaration of Principles and then said that anyone who opposed Palestinian claims to east Jerusalem could "drink from the Dead Sea. We are close to taking the rest of the West Bank."

To its credit, the U.S. administration is attempting to maintain momentum for the peace process and to generate a positive environment for negotiations. President Bill Clinton has unequivocally committed the United States to fighting the fundamentalist opponents to peace. Secretary of State Warren Christopher is attempting to steward talks between Israel and Syria. And now, Vice President Gore has extended substantial economic aid to the sputtering Gazan economy.

But how can the administration, along with the Israeli public, not shake its head in disbelief and disappointment when Arafat constantly undermines any basis for trusting him?

ALL THEY HAVE TO DO IS TO BE PHOTOGRAPHED WITH CLINTON AND RABIN!

Thoughts on Austrian reparations

Your article of March 2 on a new Austrian reparations fund for Jewish victims of Nazism brought back memories of my brave grandmother. It made me feel so proud when I was a child that she had crossed the Austrian border alone at night, going by foot into [the former] Yugoslavia. She reached Eretz Israel in 1939 at the age of 59.

Today I find myself overwhelmed by anger at the thought of the financial hardship she endured in her later years. At war's end she tried to reclaim her beautiful Vienna home, but was told it had been bombed by the Allies, and she was cajoled into a nominal settlement. (Oddly, the house, seen today, looks identical to photos from 1938.)

I think also of my aunt, whose husband perished in the Holocaust, and whose claim for compensation for their confiscated pharmacy was still unrecognized in 1965, when she died in penury, without a home of her own. (She had arrived in Eretz Israel before World War II and was thus ineligible for immigrant housing assistance.) Her claim from Austria was settled years later by her daughter.

I believe that Jewish institutions benefiting from this new fund should be expected to give priority to helping the remaining refugees from Austria or their heirs in reclaiming property, receiving compensation or applying for pensions. Austrian procedures should be simplified and published. Survivors should not feel it necessary to hire lawyers in order to cut through red tape and save themselves from harassment at the hands of oftimes unhelpful bureaucrats. While officials shake hands at ceremonies, let us not forget the individual.

Concerned about home care agency

Re: your article "New Ontario Health Bill Concerns Jewish Agencies" (CJN, March 23).

While I do believe that the Multi-Service Agency (MSA) will deliver a more comprehensive, coordinated and effective service to older persons, I too am concerned with some of the provisions of the new legislation and the ability of ethno/cultural communities to continue to provide service to meet the needs of their specific constituencies.

The Jewish community has provided significant leadership in the development of community based care. Senior Care, like all of the other Jewish agencies, wants to ensure that the reform process does not in any way diminish our capacity to provide services to our constituency. While we support the creation of MSAs, we are wholeheartedly committed to maintaining the essence of our organization which was principally established to serve our community.

Fears another 'Peace in our Time'

As the road from Oslo continues to be strewn with shattered promises, secret deals and terrorism, Jews are divided between those who trust the fulfilment of the promise that the Jewish people will at last be enabled to live in peace, and others who are filled with dread that the promised peace is merely a mirage; that those forces bent on destroying the State of Israel have not deviated from their aim, and instead, their goal has become ever closer to realization as the leaders of Israel seem committed to a path of appeasement in the manner of Neville Chamberlain's proclamation of "Peace in our Time," which precipitated World War II.

Thus, in the Diaspora, Jews are torn between, on the one hand, a sanguine acceptance of all of Israel's actions, including the inevitable difficulties encountered along the way to peace, and on the other hand, despair that the present leaders of Israel are leading their nation inexorably to extinction as more and more of the land is sliced away.

Israelis, too, are divided. To a great many, the very thought of peace for their young, war-weary state is so tantalizing that they must cling to the dream, shutting out any fearful thoughts by immersing themselves in their intimate circle of daily activities and pleasures. Others, especially those whose lives are disrupted by the daily intrusions of politics and terror, either are traumatized to immobilization or driven by a fierce will to save their homes and their country from destruction.

It is generally understood that only Israelis can decide Israel's fate. Those of us in the Diaspora are merely bystanders.

But a nagging thought persists: "standing by" (while wringing our hands) is what we did during World War II as two-thirds of European Jewry were horribly massacred in the only homes they then knew.

Young at heart

Congratulations on the beautiful editorial of Feb. 9 on Henrietta Szold. She developed the responsibility of continuing to grow spiritually and morally in old age, thus remaining young at heart; and she used her practical idealism to lay the foundation of the Israeli welfare and health system, as well as of Youth Aliyah.

When cooperating with God to better the world, people tap inexhaustible resources of energy and inspirational creativity which help to find solutions to many of the problems confronting the world and to improve it.

I am looking for survivors from Auschwitz who were there from the end of September 1944 until mid-January 1945. I was an inmate in a forced labor camp.

I am from Slovenia and worked at the I.G. Ferben Industrie Aktiengeselschaft, served in Auschwitz as chemical engineering student from Ljubyiane.

I would appreciate it if any survivors would get in touch with me who were there at that time.

DEALING WITH FAMILY PROBLEMS

Child abuse

By ERIC KIRSH

It is no small task to admit that physical and sexual abuse of children occurs within the Jewish community. Our community has struggled over the years with how best to cope with all forms of child abuse and neglect. In this and other communities, denial has been our first response. While this may have worked effectively for some adults, it clearly was not helpful to the children. Many Jewish adult incest survivors suffer today because their earlier allegations of sexual abuse were simply not acknowledged as possible, let alone true.

But physical and sexual abuse do exist in our Jewish communities.

It is unlikely that child abuse is more prevalent today than in the past. What is different is the increased reporting of those incidents to police and children's aid societies. As a result of the need to respond effectively to these reports, services have been developed to help abused children and their families, and to deal with offenders.

Children are most vulnerable becausae of their age, size and dependency on adults. The Metropolitan Toronto Special Committee on Child Abuse reports recent research suggesting that as many as one in four girls and one in eight boys in the general community will be sexually abused before the age of 18. Children with disabilities, according to studies, are two to 10 times more likely to be sexually assaulted than others.

Sexual abuse is defined as the misuse of power by someone who manipulates, tricks, forces or coerces a child into sexual contact. Sexual abuse includes incest, sexual molestation, sexual assault and the exploitation of children for pornography or prostitution.

Child sexual abuse statistics indicate that at least 85 to 90 per cent of abused children have had prior trusted relationships with their abusers and that in well over 90 per cent of reported cases of sexual abuse, offenders are men.

Jewish Family and Child Service is active in Metropolitan Toronto and York Region in the investigation of allegations of physical abuse. Physical abuse under the Child and Family Services Act is defined as physical harm inflicted by a person having charge of the child or caused by that person's failure to care and provide for, or supervise and protect the child adequately. It includes situations where children are physically harmed through hitting, slapping, striking, shoving, shaking or other acts of aggression.

Jewish Family and Child Service is obligated under the Child and Family Services Act to investigate all reported allegations of child abuse. But the agency believes that all corporal punishment of children, no matter what the intent, is harmful and inappropriate, and that effective discipline can be achieved without physical punishment.

The only way to aid abused children is with a widespread community effort to recognize early signs of abuse or potential for abuse and to reduce the impact of the abuse. The goals of any effective prevention program are to ensure the safety of children and to support those who do disclose acts of abuse.

The agency is committed to cooperating with all groups involved in prevention, investigation and treatment of child abuse. Only through a collaborative, skilled response from all service providers can we serve the children and families to whom we are accountable.

Multiple conflicts

By LINDA KISLOWICZ

The Jewish family agency today faces new challenges and opportunities as it struggles to be effective, relevant and resilient. The constant interaction between the external political, social and economic forces of society and the internal psychological and interpersonal struggles of the individual and the family create new dilemmas for both the family and the family agency trying to maintain control.

The perspective of a family agency director spans a continuum from healthy, well-functioning families to families experiencing significant difficulties and conflicts.

Parents and children who choose to participate in discussion and support groups usually use these to help with normal developmental transitions (childhood to adolescence), changes in family composition (separations, divorce and reconstituted families), or to increase their ability to anticipate and solve problems and conflicts.

Children and parents with serious problems, however, are often in crisis and unable to manage without support, direction and counsel. Consider as an example the impact of "loss" — financial loss and consequently loss of social status due to business reversals or unemployment; loss of relationships due to mobility, separation, divorce or death; or loss of independence as a result of severe psychiatric or physical illness of a family member.

It is increasingly common to see families coping with multiple difficulties that affect every member of the family. Two case illustrations may be useful.

Jonathan is an 8-year-old student in a Jewish day school. His ability to concentrate in school has decreased, his attendance has been erratic and his marks are failing. An assessment by the school social worker reveals that Jonathan's parents have recently separated after years of overt conflict.

No wonder Jonathan doesn't feel well many mornings and cannot pay attention to learning. He is worried about his mom, who alternates between being sad and being irritable, and he is convinced that if he had behaved better, his dad would still be living at home. Fortunately for Jonathan, the school understood his signals and referred him to the social worker.

Susan, 15, moved to Canada from the former Soviet Union 10 years ago. Her family has successfully rebuilt their life in Montreal. But now Susan begins to behave like a Canadian teenager, wanting more freedom and independence than her parents feel is appropriate.

It is not unusual for the peer group to become influential at this age and for teenagers to rebel against their parents' values. But Susan and her parents need help in adapting to the cultural and social changes, because they are living through two transitions, Susan's entry into adolescence and the family's renewed cultural conflicts.

The task of the Jewish family agency is to sustain healthy relationships and to help families cope with difficult issues.

This means helping Jewish couples develop respectful relationships, enabling children to express themselves and develop problem solving skills, encouraging parents to assume their parent roles in every sense of the word in both traditional and less traditional family structures. And finally, it means assuming leadership in the preservation of Jewish family life.

Comparative law: Halachah and child punishment

By RABBI MARK DRATCH

Is it permissible to hit children?

Section 43 of the Criminal Code of Canada states, "Every school teacher, parent or person standing in the place of a parent is justified in using physical force by way of correction toward a pupil or child, as the case may be, who is under his care, if the force does not exceed what is reasonable under the circumstances." In Campeau v. The King (1951) 103 C.C.C. 355, the Quebec Court of Appeal ruled that "the mere fact that the children disciplined suffered contusions and bruises is not in itself proof of exercise of undue force." This ruling presupposes that use of physical punishment is beneficial for the discipline and education of children.

Many contemporary psychologists and child rearing experts disagree and the policy of Toronto's JF&CS is to consider all physical striking a form of abuse.

Is hitting children permitted according to Jewish law?

Jewish law bans aggressive, hostile acts intended to harm or embarrass human being (Rambam, Hil. Hovel uMazik 5:1). Thus, maliciously injuring, hitting, abusing or even raising a hand against another is prohibited. However, when those blows are intended for a productive purpose, such aggression may not only be tolerated, but may also be mandatory. Thus, therapeutic procedures like surgery, court administered lashes and striking someone to prevent him from sinning were considered legitimate pretexts for assaulting another person. And biblical verses like "He that spareth the rod hateth his child, but he that loveth him chaseneth him betimes" (Proverbs 13:24) have been understood to condone hitting a child as an effective tool in his education and discipline. (The more popular "Spare the rod and spoil the child" actually is from Samuel Butler's Hudibras.)

Despite what appears to be unrestricted license to hit children, rabbinic authorities placed severe limits on the use of physical force. To mention just two examples: The Talmudic sage Rav forewarned Shmuel b. Shilat that when he hit a student he was not to use a stick, but a shoelace (Baba Batra 21a). The rabbis admonished parents not to strike older children for fear that they might strike back and violate the biblical injunction against such behaviour (Kiddushin 30a).

In rejecting the findings of current experts which contradict the traditional practice of "patching" children, one contemporary religious authority warned, "We must be careful in every novel matter of the modern researchers concerning psychology and education. It is necessary to evaluate and scrutinize [their theories] in order to ensure that they do not contradict the words of the Sages, of blessed memory, and the early authorities, or the customs of Israel which are themselves Torah. If there is any contradiction, you must cast away their filthy innovations, and not accept anything from them before you conduct keen study and research in Torah, [in the writings of] the Sages, of blessed memory."

While not at all disputing the primacy of Torah principles in directing Jewish behavior even when contemporary mores contradict them, one may question this conclusion. The biblical verse "Instruct a child according to his way" (Proverbs 22:6) suggests, in fact, that there is no one correct way to raise all children, and the biblical plea "Do not hurt my anointed" (II Chronicles 15:22) is an appeal for the protection and pampering of our youth (Shabbat 199a).

One can even put forth a halachic argument. In essence, it is forbidden to strike one's child just as it is forbidden to hit one's neighbor. Special dispensation is granted only when hitting serves the cause of education and discipline; it is considered a mitzvah only when administered properly.

Jewish law limits the force used, demanding that it not be administered in a cruel manner or motivated by anger or animosity (Rambam, Hil. Talmud Torah 2:2). But if parents and teachers do not execute punishment in an objective and unemotional way, or if they hit too hard or too often to have any positive disciplinary effect, then such blows are forbidden. And if contemporary psychologists reveal information that was previously unknown, i.e., that physical discipline is not educationally effective, or if human behavior and psychology today, in a society with different communal values and a culture with different presumptions, differs from what it was in previous ages (this is a significant halachic principle that is known in rabbinic language as "nishtanu hativi'im, that "nature" has changed), then hitting children is halachically prohibited.

What, then, is the halachically prescribed form of discipline? There is none! Our tradition does not prescribe the methods of discipline, but rather directs parents and teachers to raise properly educated and behaved children. The Proverbial rod may be a metaphor for proper education and discipline, and not a literal tool for meting out corporal punishment. Whatever methods are psychologically sound and educationally effective are halachically mandated.

And whatever means are ineffective or, worse yet, detrimental to the physical and emotional safety and spiritual stability of children, are prohibited. Raising children is not an easy task, but we must not let our inexperience, personal anxieties or personal inadequacies enable us to treat our children in ways that are harmful to their physical well being, their self-esteem, and their spiritual integrity.

Opinions

A strange reversal of history

Israeli journals and newspapers rarely have anything to say about Canada. So what can one make of a story which is practically unknown to Canadian Jews, but which appeared in a recent issue of the Jerusalem Report? Written by Anya Makow of Winnipeg, it has a strange story to tell, which I had not seen reported anywhere else.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

It so happens that there is a small Protestant institution called Providence College, located somewhere south of Winnipeg. My Canadian World Almanac and Book of Facts has no information about it, but the story itself is worth a special notation.

Makow writes there is a 44-year-old teacher at this college, Dennis Stoutenberg, who is making history of a special sort.

He teaches theology, in which he received a PhD and in the process became deeply involved in the Jewish practices of Jesus Christ. To his amazement he realized the Christianity of today, which functions in the name of Jesus and swears allegiance to him, has strayed from Jesus' own personal convictions and practices.

Stoutenberg began to study the mode of life which Jesus was likely to have lived in his day. "Jesus never attended church one day of his life," he says. "He was raised under the Judaic code in his own day, attended synagogue and made festival pilgrimages to the Temple. He never established a new religion."

Attempting to walk in the ways of this person, Stoutenberg and his wife have made their home kosher (even though they realized some details of kashrut were codified in later centuries; but knowing that the foundation is found in the Torah, they decided to abide by such laws). They celebrate Shabbat and all chagim, and Stoutenberg says the daily prayers, puts on tefillin and has studied with Orthodox and Conservative rabbis.

Fervor has become contagious

Now, according to Makow, Stoutenberg's fervor has become contagious. A number of his students keep the Sabbath and observe kashrut. "At first I was surprised that the college administration was not offended by this," she reports Stoutenberg as saying. "But my colleagues are very supportive. Even the kitchen staff has gone out of its way to ensure that we are accommodated with a rich variety of vegetarian offerings."

Stoutenberg has become active in Winnipeg's Christian and Jewish communities, and pastors of various denominations have asked him to teach their congregations about the Jewish background of Christianity and to conduct model Passover seders.

Asked whether he has considered converting, Stoutenberg avers this would involve giving up his current position, which affords him the potential to introduce Christians to Jewish beliefs. "For me, the question is: Can I be more valuable to the Jewish community as a Christian, or as a Jew? I see my role as a service to God."

Actually, the story of Stoutenberg is not as unique as one would think. In the early part of this century, a French writer and theologian, Aime Palliere, made news in a somewhat similar fashion. He had been born into a devout Catholic family and his spiritual quest led him first into the Salvation Army and in time towards Judaism. Although he became deeply familiar with our faith and wanted to convert, he was persuaded to settle for the status of a Noachide, who observes seven basic commandments but does not fully convert to Judaism.

Palliere, however, lived the life of an ardent and ascetic Jew. His best known work was his autobiography, The Unknown Sanctuary (published in English in 1928). He raised many people's hopes that a more liberalized attitude towards Judaism would take hold in France, but he was disappointed and towards the end of his life began to move closer to his original faith.

Let us not betray our heritage

Recently a group of Jewish organizations took out a newspaper advertisement announcing their suppport for the Republican Contract with America, which contains a well-publicized attack on social programs. Their advertisement was answered by a riposte from the other Jews denouncing the ad, citing the Jewish moral imperative for society to protect its most vulnerable members.

Jean M. Gerber

Canada, too, is looking at the strain on its social dollars; our recent budget bodes ill for the social network. The Reform party's counter-budget is even more draconian. Neo-conservatives consider our social network as a hammock in which the undeserving poor have taken refuge.

The notion of the undeserving poor is odious in its implication that the victim is responsible for her or his fate. Judaism teaches individual responsibility, but it also teaches communal responsibility towards the dignity of the individual.

Tzedakah is an obligation on all, rich and poor; in its highest form it is a way to free the recipient from dependency. This was not the concept of Victorian lawmakers, who tried to make the experience of poverty disgraceful, a mark of sin on the part of the poor and disenfranchised. Their attitude is alive and well today.

Soon we will retell the story of redemption from slavery. That slavery was spiritual as well as physical: it destroyed the soul as well as the body, threatening to undermine the essence of the covenant between God and the descendants of Abraham.

Did the Jews deserve their fate? Had they earned it by shirking their civic and moral obligations? I think not. Slavery arose because it was imposed, not sought or deserved. Did the Jews liberate themselves? Not according to the story — it took no less than divine intervention and determined leadership.

The Jewish view of social responsibility, individual and communal, is the antithesis of current neo-conservative thought. Jewish tradition does not assume the person in want has merited poverty or despair as a consequence of his or her actions; it assumes that at any time misfortune can fall on the most righteous, as well as the ordinary.

Recalling our own liberation, we are commanded to make sure no other group is hopelessly enslaved by its circumstances. Can we as Jews, secular or religious, abandon our obligation to the well-being of those who cannot feed their children, heal their own wounds, provide a safe and secure environment in which their children can grow?

North American Jews live in countries of incredible wealth and accomplishment. They have helped to shape societies which have powerful potential for fulfilling the ideals of social justice. For Jews to align themselves with a philosophy which is punishing, careless of those in most need, and unfairly jealous of its own welfare at the expense of the less able, is wrong.

If nothing else persuades us, let us look at reality: children raised in poverty, without hope, by parents who feel powerless to change their circumstances cost society. Yes, our network needs mending, but not demolition. As Jews we can do no less without betraying our own heritage.

Wiesel's memoirs a triumph

The first volume of Elie Wiesel's memoirs is a powerfully moving cultural map of the Jewish world in the last 65 years.

By Arnold Ages

Written in French and titled Tous les Fleuves Vont à La Mer (All The Rivers Flow Into the Sea), the English translation will not be available until December. Wiesel uses the language of Voltaire and Racine to reconstruct with uncanny precision a childhood and adolescence in Sighet, Transylvania, a post-Holocaust sojourn in Paris, lengthy visits to Israel and residence in New York City.

Each of the geographical foci of this anthology of memories has its own special élan because, in each, Wiesel experienced events which traumatized him deeply and he encountered people who effected profound changes in his psyche.

The most painful part of the book deals with Wiesel's childhood in Sighet and the cocoon-like atmosphere in which Jewish piety was enveloped in those days when the gathering Nazi storm was about to unleash its full fury on disbelieving Hungarian Jews.

Wiesel gives names to the rebbes, merchants, melamdim, artisans and storekeepers who peopled his tiny hamlet — and who perished.

There were rumors and reports from Jews who had escaped from the Polish inferno and arrived in Sighet to tell of mass murder and unthinkable bestiality. The sad witnesses told their story; they were humored and fed — and dismissed. Even on the day the Nazis arrived in Sighet the man who was baking matzah for the forthcoming holiday refused to abandon his work.

Thus, when Wiesel and his family arrived at Auschwitz (after a horrendous trip on a cattle car) some of the kapos (Jewish guards) screamed at them: "Why did you come?"

"Did they think we had responded to some invitation?" says Wiesel.

Wiesel and his father survived under excruciatingly difficult circumstances almost until the end of the war — almost. Shortly before liberation, Wiesel had a problem with his knee and with obvious misgivings, he went to the Auschwitz infirmary. Miraculously, he survived an operation and was in the recovery phase when his father told him the arrival of the Soviets was imminent.

Fearing that the Nazis would try to wipe out all evidence of their ignominious crime, Wiesel and his father decided not to remain in the camp but chose to join the evacuation to Buchenwald. His father did not survive the move and Wiesel is obsessed to this day with his father's death. Those who remained to await the Soviets at Auschwitz were not harmed.

After the war, Wiesel went to Paris with other young Jewish refugees and he tried to regain his equilibrium. His account of his years in France is filled with mystery, humor, pathos and unrequited love. He lost a chance to acquire French citizenship effortlessly because of a language problem. In France he met Shoushanai, a Talmudic genius who mentored Wiesel but who shook the metaphysical foundations of his pupil's faith at the same time.

One of the leitmotifs that flows through this autobiography is Wiesel's dark memories of his poverty. He experienced it first-hand in his native Sighet (although he only realized its extent after visiting the town later in life), in France after the war, in visits to Israel and during the early part of his sojourn in the United States. There were times that Wiesel literally had nothing to eat, and even when he acquired jobs as a freelancer for the Israeli paper Yediot Ahronot, his pay was meagre.

After years of barely eking out a living in the United States things changed, especially after the publication and translation of his novel Night. His success was tempered by a near fatal auto accident he had when working in New York for the Yiddish newspaper Forward.

Perhaps the warmest part of Wiesel's memoir concerns his mentor Professor Saul Lieberman of the Jewish Theological Seminary. For 17 years, Wiesel studied on a regular basis with the great Talmudist and held his own with Lieberman. Once when Lieberman showed Weisel that the pupil's insights into a specific text had been anticipated hundreds of years before, Wiesel responded astutely that "study is not discovery but rediscovery."

Reading Wiesel's memoir is like that response; it is both discovery and rediscovery.

The consummate gossip

All is ephemeral — fame and the famous as well. Marcus Aurelius, Meditations IV.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Walter Winchell (1897-1972) was the most powerful newspaperman of his day. By one estimate, 50 million Americans, out of an adult population of 75 million, either read his syndicated daily column or listened to his weekly radio program in the 1930s and 1940s.

The grandson of an itinerant cantor from White Russia, Winchell was a brash, fast-talking, brilliantly-connected former vaudevillian whose claim to fame was the invention of the gossip column.

By elevating gossip to a place of renown, Winchell expanded the purview of news, created a new, much-criticized form of journalism and forever shattered the taboo against what could be said about celebrities in the media. As he declared somewhat inelegantly: "Democracy is where everybody can kick everybody else's ass."

In short, he helped to usher in a new mass culture of celebrity fixated on personalities, dedicated to emphemera and centred in New York, Los Angeles and Washington, writes Neal Gabler in his absorbing biography, Winchell (Random House, $42).

Winchell, whose original family name was Weinschel, was not to the manor born. Like many East European Jewish immigrants, Winchell's father was a struggling garment worker who barely earned a living. The Winchells, we're told, were constantly on the move, presumably to dodge the rent collector or to take advantage of the rent reductions that landlords often offered new tenants as an inducement.

To the end of his days, Winchell never forgot the poverty of his youth, the deprivation he suffered, the times he went unfed and neglected. The want he knew as a child bred in him a profound sense of insecurity, a gnawing feeling that lingered on, even after he had attained the status of the highest-paid columnist in America.

Gabler wastes little time chronicling Winchell's career on the vaudeville circuit, and rightly so. He was not blessed with a surfeit of talent. And besides, he nursed a bug for journalism.

Winchell's entry into the hurly-burly of journalism can be traced back to the year 1919, when he began submitting short columns — a melange of news and one-liners — to Billboard, a vaudeville trade paper. He continued doing this until he joined the staff of the Graphic, a scandal-mongering New York City tabloid, in 1924.

His column, Your Broadway and Mine, was steeped in the folkways, fads, jokes and language of Tin Pan Alley. And as might be expected, Winchell had no reverence whatsoever for grammar or high-blown prose.

Borrowing heavily from show business shorthand, Winchell affected a breezy style filled with slang. As Gabler suggests, slang was more than Winchell's protection against his own deficiencies in grammar. It was a form of cultural democracy, a way for the unlettered masses to reclaim their language from the genteel elites.

By pandering to his readers' preferences, Winchell crossed what was widely considered the boundaries of good taste. Before Winchell appeared on the scene, editors of mainstream newspapers rarely, if ever, pried into people's private lives with such vigor and abandon. Being a revolutionary, he tore down the barrier between the private and the public, the gossip sheet and the daily newspaper.

Traditionalists, of course, were shocked and appalled. In 1932, the editor of Editor & Publisher wrote: "The talk of the columnists is borrowed from gigolo society and is about as responsible as the chatter one might hear over cups in a night club."

Rival columnist Westbrook Pegler was blunter, labelling Winchell "a louse in the blouse of journalism," while intellectuals were offended because they believed he represented a kind of rabble-rousing they found unacceptable and threatening.

Be that as it may, Winchell's star rose. He signed on with the Mirror, a New York daily whose circulation and prestige dwarfed that of the Graphic. And he became a broadcaster, hosting The Lucky Strike Dance Hour, a program that established him as "a national icon" by virtue of the fact that 60 per cent of all radio listeners tuned in to the show.

By that point, Winchell — whom novelist Ernest Hemingway once described as "the greatest newspaperman that ever lived" — was a celebrity in his own right. There were songs, stories, plays and movies about him. Advertisements featured him, and Winchell made the cover of Time magazine. It was all very lucrative. In 1939, he earned $358,000, a tidy sum even today.

As the most famous American journalist, he was the prototype of how journalists looked and acted. Ben Hecht and Charles MacArthur, newspapermen themselves, captured this image of a glib, wise-cracking, cynical, fedora-hatted snoop in their Broadway play, The Front Page, which became a legendary Hollywood movie.

Walter Winchell near the end.

Despite his Anglo-Saxon surname, Winchell never denied or forgot he was Jewish. Although he was not a practising Jew, never setting foot in a synagogue after his Bar Mitzvah, he considered himself an "intuitive Jew."

"If there was one consistent thread in his crazy-quilt life, it was his Jewishness," his colleague, Herman Klurfeld, said. Winchell had a radar-like sensitivity to anti-Semitism, and after the rise of Nazism in Germany, he constantly ridiculed Hitler.

Through his political columns (Winchell diversified his writing in the late 1930s), he also attacked anti-Semites and Nazi sympathizers in the United States. His most important source was Arnold Forster, the counsel for the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai Brith.

While fulsomely praising President Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal liberalism, Winchell was unsparingly critical of domestic communists. "We are less in danger today from Hitler's army in Paris," he observed in 1940, "than we are from [Stalin's] agents in America..."

After World War II, Winchell launched a full-scale witchhunt against communists and communism, broadcasting increasingly more heinous charges of Soviet skulduggery each week. During the 1950s, he joined forces with that consummate witchhunter, Senator Joseph McCarthy. No wonder the Soviet deputy foreign minister denounced Winchell as a warmonger.

Zionism was another of Winchell's pet causes. As Arab-Jewish tension in Palestine mounted, he called for a Jewish state there, declaring that the dispossessed Jews of Europe deserved their own homeland. Like the majority of American Zionists, Winchell was not animated by the belief that Jews in the United States should make aliyah.

Winchell's decline as a personality was slow but steady. Convinced that television was "here to stay," he climbed on the bandwagon as a commentator. But the medium did not really suit him. On TV, he came across as a fidgeting old man rather than a crusading reporter.

By the 1960s, his column was getting whittled, even chopped entirely. In May 1967, he was informed by the Hearst Corporation that his services were no longer needed. "Frankly, our general feeling is that Winchell is passe," an executive opined.

Winchell's syndicated column, which was carried by more than 2,000 newspapers, died because of the rise of TV, a growing sophistication among newspaper readers, changing sexual mores and the decline of Hollywood.

Pathetically, Winchell took out a full-page ad in Variety announcing his availability as a columnist. The McNaught syndicate agreed to distribute his column, but in lesser-known newspapers and magazines. Plainly, Winchell's days were numbered. Celebrities snubbed him, press agents ignored him. When he succumbed to bone cancer, he was portrayed as a relic long past his prime.

His legacy is clear. Winchell enlivened journalism, but he also debased it.

As Gabler puts it: "Once loosed, gossip refused to confine itself to columns. Once loosed, it danced all over the paper, sometimes seizing headlines, sometimes spawning whole publications and television programs, sometimes, more insidiously, infecting reportage of so-called straight news by emphasizing voice and personalities at the expense of objectivity and duller facts."

This assessment may sound unduly harsh, but it resounds to the ring of the truth.

Jewish World

The Holocaust in Holland

For historians of the Holocaust, Holland is a conundrum. Proportionally more Jews were deported from the Netherlands than from any other country in Western Europe. Yet, arguably, there was not a nation in Europe where there was less anti-Semitism than in Holland.

Louis de Jong, a distinguished Dutch historian, grapples with this paradox in The Netherlands and Nazi Germany (Harvard University Press, $14.95 U.S.), a slim but useful volume.

A Jew whose parents perished in the Holocaust, de Jong starts with a psychological explanation. Holland had a proud record as a haven for Jews fleeing persecution, and, in general, Dutch anti-Semitism was of a "mild" variety. Therefore, de Jong reasons, Jews "felt at home" in the Netherlands, and were not as wary of their surroundings as, say, Polish Jews. When the crunch came, they were unable to cope, being "victims of their own past."

This makes sense, but in all fairness, no Jewish community under Nazism, no matter where, was really prepared for an unprecedented event like the Holocaust.

According to de Jong, the Jews of Holland received virtually no help from the Dutch government, which did not believe the Germans would deport all Jews. He adds that the deportations began nearly a year before the spring of 1943, when mass strikes had made both the people and part of the civil service more inclined to resist the Nazis.

There were, to be sure, strikes prior to 1943. For example: On Feb. 25, 1941, following the brutal beating of 400 Jews in Amsterdam, almost the entire working population of Amsterdam went on strike. But these anti-Nazi manifestations were easily broken up.

Everyone knows the story of Anne Frank and her family. In actual practice, very few Jews had a hiding place like the Franks. Most Jews who eluded the Nazi dragnet, some 25,000 out of 140,000, found refuge in the homes of non-Jews. By de Jong's estimate, about one-third of these escapees were either detected or betrayed. Regrettably, de Jong glosses over this phenomenon, and furthermore, all but ignores the collaborationist activities of Dutch Nazis.

Accentuating the positive, de Jong claims that there were at least 2,000 to 3,000 resistance workers whose main or exclusive endeavor consisted of finding hiding places, papers, food coupons and money for Jews on the run.

While it is true that Germany failed to convert Holland into a Nazi state, the Nazis succeeded in exploiting Holland's economic potential.

Interestingly enough, the Nazis held Holland with a minimum of force. There was no need for a large garrison because Holland was relatively compact and flat, with few forests, and it had an excellent road and railway network. As a result, the Nazis had the upper hand as they went about the methodical business of exterminating Dutch Jewry.

Rabbinic Reflections

By RABBI MORDECAI E. ZEITZ

Survey your friends and relatives. Ask them to share with you what they feel are the most important things they are blessed with. No doubt there will be a significant assortment of suggestions. They are all most relevant and important: family, spouse, children, health, job, material well-being — and the list goes on.

There is, however, one blessing that towers above all others, the one that enables all other blessings. It is so often taken for granted, even squandered and wasted. The blessing I refer to is time.

All other things can be replaced if need be. Fortunes are made and lost. Friendships falter and are replaced. Even family loyalties and connections — with pain and frustration — are recyclable. Much can be done to restore health and improve the quality of life.

Only one thing remains irreplaceable. Once gone, it can never be restored. It is the blessing of time. You can relive it on video or capture the moment in a photo, but even that is already at a later time.

While time itself is of high priority, within Judaism we have made the telling or counting of time special as well. While the whole world tells time by the sun and its calendar, we are moon people. We tell time by the moon and follow a modified lunar calendar. Not only do we count and measure time according to the movement of the moon, but our concept of time is defined by the very existence of the moon.

This Shabbat is Parshat Hachodesh, the declaration of the mitzvah of marking time by the moon and its renewable cycle. The sun shines brightly all day, every day. Clouds sometimes block it, but for the most part the daytime has the continuing benefit of the sun. The sun contains its own source of energy and it is so bright that you dare not look directly at it.

Not so the moon. It has reflected light. It has no source of light of its own. Its greatest contribution comes in the midst of darkness. Its illumination varies according to the time of the month. Sometimes it is virtually gone, while at other times it is full, bright and beautiful. At all times, whether we see it or not, the moon is there. In the darkest of nights, we know and believe unequivocally, that in time the moon will reappear. It will shine and we will enjoy its light.

Yes, we are moon people. We reflect the qualities of the moon. Our sense of time and reverence of time are moon-based. And we also shine best in times of darkness. We have difficulty coping with freedom and security. In an open society we forget our unique purpose of bringing Godliness and spirituality to human endeavor. All too often, we feel that the very word Jew is a burden and not a privilege.

But in those dark times of personal and historic challenges, we see the light. We become a powerful source of enlightenment. Too often, the light of Jewish existence has almost disappeared. Jewish life has almost been counted out. But then we see the light, we see the beauty of Judaism and we rebound just in time. Just when we think the final spark is gone, it reappears, for in fact it was ever present.

Being moon persons is even more significant as we approach Pesach. We not only observe Pesach at the appropriate time, but its observance adds to our appreciation of time. As I prepare for the seder I am not alone. As I sit at the seder, I have more than just my family and friends at the seder table.

The timeless treasures of Jewish history all appear at my seder: Moses sitting alongside me and the children of Israel, contemplating the challenge of the exodus; the pilgrims ascending to Jerusalem to celebrate Passover on the Temple Mount; Elijah the Prophet visiting homes that span 2,000 years, in every country on the face of the earth; the martyrs of the Holocaust who sanctified Jewish history with their lives; and the Soviet, Ethiopian and Syrian Jews who have inspired us with their return to the mainstream of Jewish history. Seder time is the time of the collective spirit and being of the Jewish people.

Jews don't tell time. Time tells us what was and what should be. Time is the gift we have but for a moment. What time is it? It all depends on what we do with it.

Sephardi group explores culture

By SYLVIA PAPERNICK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A year and a half ago, a small group of friends gathered to explore their history and heritage.

The Sephardi Discussion Group of Toronto now has regular events attended by 30 to 50 people, including some Ashkenazim.

Founded by Ayal Cohon and Jaques Sayegh and his sister Naomi, the group has discussed Sephardi food, music and customs among other topics.

Information is shared about Sephardi cultures from India, Turkey, Morocco, Afganistan, Egypt, Iraq, Iran and Ethiopia.

Sayegh said the group provides an opportunity for people who have similar but different traditions to exchange information.

"I'm really delighted that there is strong interest and participation by Ashkenazi people," he said.

Both Sephardim and Ashkenazim sit on the programming committee. Member Laura Zeitz called the group an important learning opportunity. "While the Ashkenazim and the Sephardim are unique and different, we both share a common Jewish heritage," she said.

The group has discussed such topics as the sites of the tombs of Mordechai and Esther in Iran, and it has debated the unanswered question of Christopher Columbus' Jewishness.

"Just because a person is born into the Sephardi culture doesn't mean he knows a lot about it," Cohon said.

The group has raised funds to aid Syrian Jewry. They also maintain a loose affiliation with the Sephardi Education Centre in Los Angeles.

Sarah Carlen, professor of Sephardi Studies in the Social Sciences Division at York University, is working to establish an independent chair in Sephardi Studies. Her specialty is race and interethnic relations, looking especially at the cultural differences between Ashkenazim and Sephardim.

For more information, call Cohon at 416-512-6693 or Sayegh at 416-784-0513.

Jewish Life

New hopes for Russian Jews

By
FRANCINE CYTRYNBAUM

Francine Cytrynbaum was part of a Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) delegation from Montreal that travelled to the former Soviet Union last November as part of a program co-sponsored by the Montreal Jewish community and the Quebec government. Cytrynbaum, 26, has worked for 2½ years as a JIAS immigration and resettlement counsellor.

Alina was 12 years old when I met her, but her interest in Judaism had begun at the age of 10, when she spent the summer in a Jewish camp.

GUEST VOICES

Coming from a small Russian city with no organized Jewish community, she decided to go to Moscow to learn about Judaism and lead a Jewish life. She contacted the director of a Jewish girls' school in Moscow, and early in September she turned up on the doorstep with her suitcase, ready to learn.

I spent a Shabbat at the school in Moscow, praying and eating with the young women in the seminary. These women are not only learning about Judaism academically, they are also living an Orthodox Jewish life. They are training to become Jewish teachers for towns all over Russia.

Alina, who studies in the girl's day school, lives with the family of the school director. She can speak Hebrew fluently and proudly sang Hebrew songs for me and showed me the steps to an Israeli folk dance she had learned in school.

Where once any practice of Judaism was illegal and dangerous, now one can buy kosher meat and bread, and packaged products from Israel. This does not suggest that it is any less dangerous to be Jewish in Russia than in the past. Synagogues are still targets for attacks and Jews are still in danger.

Where Jews were once openly restricted from educational and professional advancement because of their nationality, there are no longer official barriers. Today, life in Russia is dangerous in general, because of political and economic instability and rampant Mafia-style control of the developing world of business and finance. The growth of right-wing, nationalistic groups poses an additional threat to the shrinking Jewish communities.

I was in Moscow for two weeks with the team from JIAS. Our purpose was to assist in the immigration processing of approximately 100 families from the former Soviet Union who were to join family members in Montreal.

Our office space in Moscow was rented from a Jewish cultural centre in a decrepit and unheated building, where the cultural activities nevertheless drew Jewish Muscovites from all over the city. Listening to a rehearsal of the Moscow Jewish men's choir, we were moved to tears at the beauty of their renditions of liturgical and secular songs in Hebrew and Yiddish.

As a team of four, we interviewed each family and helped them to complete their applications for immigration. A major part of our work was to prepare the candidates for their move to Canada.

Our hope was that the families would have somewhat realistic expectations about Montreal. Employment was a main concern. Professionals could not expect to be at their Russian level in Canada. They are fortunate if they can find a first job at a lower level in their own field. Many must retrain in another field altogether if they want to find work.

The group we are helping comprises only a small number of the Jews leaving the former Soviet Union. Israel and the United States draw the largest numbers, but there is a steady stream coming into Canada as well. The exodus of the young, the healthy and the professionals to Israel and North America has resulted in the increasing isolation of the remaining Jewish population. The old, particularly those who are frail, are now left in a society whose public social and medical systems are grossly insufficient.

Alina has already made some important choices. In the coming years, changes in Russia may allow her to live a safe and fulfilling Jewish life with a sense of community and a strong knowledge of her identity.

Given the uncertainty of Russia's political, economic and social structure, however, another scenario could be her having to flee her country because of the choice to live her life as a Jew.

Having a solid knowledge of Hebrew would make Israel a logical destination. Alternately, immigrating to North America with a strong Jewish education and a commitment to Jewish life and continuity would afford her an advantage over Soviet immigrants of the past, who, lacking this background were marginalized from the community upon their arrival.

Whatever her choice, one can only hope that it be made in safety. Having met with members of the Jewish community of Moscow, we can only hope, but there is much to fear as well.

The silent sister

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

The first time we encounter Moses' sister Miriam, she is standing beside the Nile guarding her brother.

Pharaoh has decreed that all male children will be drowned in the Nile, and Moses has been placed in an ark and set upon the water. It is Miriam who guards him.

Interestingly, the Bible does not introduce anyone in this scene by name but Moses. Miriam is called only "his sister." Moses is the central figure. Although Miriam orchestrates the scene, she remains a nameless figure.

After the Egyptians drown in the Red Sea, Israel is led by Moses in a song of praise to God. Subsequently, Miriam leads the women in singing and dancing the same song of praise.

It is only here that we are introduced to Miriam by name. She is "Miriam, the prophetess, the sister of Aaron." Not only are we given a proper name, but she is identified as Aaron's sister, not Moses'. By detaching her from Moses, the text gives the reader to understand that she is a woman who stands apart.

Previously she acted as Moses' sister because he was central. On the shores of the Red Sea, Miriam becomes a leader of women in her own right.

The reader is struck by the settings where we see Miriam, first on the shore of the Nile and again at the Red Sea. Her very name embodies the word water, since the second syllable is yam, Hebrew for sea.

Miriam's link with water is not lost on the rabbis of the Talmud, who assign her far greater importance in guarding Moses and sustaining Israel than does the Bible.

Because of Miriam, the Talmud says, a well appears in the desert. "Miriam's well" follows Israel through the desert and provides water for the nation.

After Miriam's death, the people complain to Moses that they have no water; the well has disappeared. Moses attempts to provide water from the rock, but instead of speaking to the rock as instructed, Moses hits the rock.

The episode is ultimately linked to Moses' death. In a sense, he dies because he cannot provide water for Israel in an appropriate fashion.

Miriam and Moses are connected throughout their lives by the image of water. When it is decreed that Moses should die in the Nile, Miriam intervenes by watching that the water does not harm him.

At the shore of the Red Sea, Miriam takes a stance as a religious leader of women and leads them in praise of God. She is her own person. She sustains the people with water in the desert. When she dies, she is irreplaceable.

Moses cannot provide water in a similar fashion and Moses' destiny that he will die because of water is fulfilled.

The Talmud understands Miriam's pivotal role in the destinies of both Moses and Israel. Giving water in the desert is giving life to the people — it is Miriam who masters this role.

Leo Baeck kids collect toys for Cuban day care centre

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Children in a day care centre in Varadaro, Cuba, will have toys to play with, thanks to the generosity of students at Leo Baeck Day School in Thornhill.

Grade 8 student Lyle Sugar, president of the students' council, had promised to collect 250 toys — one for each child in the day care. By Purim, when the drive ended, they had surpassed that goal.

Most of the donations, mainly stuffed animals and Fischer-Price toys, were the children's own, said Sugar, who contributed personally as well as arranging the drive.

"It's hard to part with a well-loved toy. Kids get very attached to their things," he said. "The day care centre is a good place to give them. Those kids need them more than I do."

Parent Nira Miro discovered the day care centre during a recent trip to Cuba.

"When I saw the place, I was so upset," she told The CJN.

The children, who range in age from six months to 5½ years old, only have a couple of glass bottles and cardboard boxes that they got from tourists to play with, she said.

"Infants are kept in a huge play-pen, and the caregivers sing and bang on pots to entertain them.

Miro is hoping that Royal Air Lines, a charter airline that flies to Cuba, will transport the toys, and she has arranged with a tour company to transport them to Varadaro.

"I am trying to get donations of medication, like children's Tylenol, to take too, but I haven't had much luck," she added.

The day care is not Jewish, and she does not know if there are any Jewish children there.

"But the religious aspect isn't important," she feels. "It's a kids to kids project."

Teacher David Greenbaum, staff advisor to the students' council, assisted the youngsters.

Sugar noted that the toy drive is just one of the school's tzedakah projects, which include two food drives.

Black comic turns to Judaism

TORONTO — Don't ask Chicago comedian Aaron Freeman for a complicated, Talmudic explanation of why he converted to Judaism.

"I genuinely and truly love the tribe," is he all he says.

Freeman spent 16 years with the famed Second City comedy troupe in Chicago, where he performed alongside George Wendt, Shelley Long, Jim Belushi and Mike Myers.

He will be taking his act to Toronto for the first time on April 1, at an event sponsored by United Jewish Appeal's Young Leadership Network.

Freeman, the product of Catholic home and Catholic schooling, converted to Judaism last year at 37. "I'm a survivor of Catholic education," he said. "It tends to produce non-Catholics."

The black comic's journey to Judaism was sparked after attending university in New York. He then studied at Chicago's Spertus College of Judaica. "I knew it was a Jewish school because the rabbi arrived at 6:50 p.m. for a 6:30 class."

Now, a year after his conversion, Freeman claims complete acceptance by the Jewish community — "which embraced me even before I joined the tribe" — and a strong sense of security and comfort.

"For me being a Jew is like rounding third base, sliding home and hearing the umpire say 'You're safe,' " he quipped. "It's a culture that I value and cherish. I'm proud that my children are Jewish, that they say Shema and light the candles every Friday night."

Freeman's comedy career began at university, where he "wrote jokes and watched people mess up my humor" before quickly learning how lucrative it could be to perform himself. "I discovered that if you make strangers laugh for 15 minutes, you can earn $300," he said.

There is a serious side to Aaron Freeman. He was a regular contributor to the award-winning MacNeil/Lehrer News Hour, and a reporter at the 1992 Republican National Convention. He's also a writer, with his own radio and TV shows.

Freeman's guest appearance in Toronto will take place during an event called Rock at the ROM, on April 1 at the Royal Ontario Museum. Tickets are available by calling 416-635-2883, ext. 172.

Chana Javasky awarded Waldman scholarship

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Although almost six years have passed since Dennis Waldman's untimely death, a select number of young people are still benefiting from the late educator's belief in higher education and commitment to Jewish values.

Chana Javasky, 17, of Thornhill, is the 1994-95 recipient of the Dennis Waldman Foundation for Jewish Education scholarship. A graduate of Ulpanat Orot, Javasky is spending a year in Israel studying pedagogy and Jewish studies at Michlala Jerusalem College for Women.

The $1,800 scholarship was established by Waldman's family and friends in 1990. It is given annually to a student graduating from a Jewish high school and going on to university or yeshivah, or to a student graduating from a public high school with the intention of pursuing a course of Jewish study.

Chana Javasky

Waldman was a general studies teacher at Associated Hebrew Schools from 1980 to 1988. He then worked for the City of York as an adult education teacher until his death from a heart attack in June 1989.

"We find [the scholarship] a very meaningful way to keep his memory alive," said Nell Waldman, Dennis' widow. She added that the calibre of student applicants is such that "there's rarely a kid you wouldn't like to give a scholarship to.

"Chana was both scholarly and very genuine," she said.

In her application essay, Javasky wrote of her feelings of Jewish unity and her sense of responsibility to educate others.

Javasky has extensive volunteer experience, both with youngsters and the elderly. In Israel she is volunteering with Ethiopian olim and tutoring young children.

She is the fifth recipient of the scholarship. Application deadline for the coming year is April 28.

HAMILTON — David Steinberg, the man who has done much to set the Hamilton Jewish community's flagging fortunes on an upward course, has been named this year's Jewish National Fund (JNF) Negev Dinner honoree.

The dinner takes place May 22 at Adas Israel Synagogue.

Steinberg, a family court judge, has been president of federation for two years. Under his leadership, the long-planned community endowment fund has been established, a priorities and planning committee is defining the community's future needs, and the struggling Jewish Community Centre (JCC) has adopted a stringent survival plan.

As 1983 and 1984 United Jewish Appeal campaign chair, Steinberg succeeded in turning Hamilton's sagging campaign around, and later, as United Israel Appeal (UIA) Ontario region chair, he did much to establish closer cooperation between smaller Jewish communities and UIA and closer links with Israel.

A Hamilton native, Steinberg grew up in a strongly committed family. His grandparents Max and Ethel Walters were among the founding members of Ohav Zedek Congregation (Hess Street Shul), and his parents, Sophie and the late Sam Steinberg, were active volunteers.

David Steinberg

He attended the University of Western Ontario Law School and was called to the bar in 1965.

Appointed to the Ontario provincial court (family division) in 1969, Steinberg became the youngest judge at the age of 31.

He is active on numerous committees concerned with family matters and troubled children and adolescents, is a former member of the Attorney General's Rules Committee of the Ontario Family Courts, served as a consultant to the Federal Law Reform Commission, Family Law Project, and is a past president of the Provincial Judges' Association of Ontario.

He lectures extensively, has conducted seminars on family law at McMaster University Medical School, and is the author of numerous publications, including an economics textbook and two volumes of Family Law in the Family Courts, published in 1981 and 1986.

Steinberg is also a former president of Beth Jacob Synagogue and of the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation in Hamilton.

An award-winning amateur photographer, he has shown his work in local group and solo exhibitions and has just completed a two-year term as chair of the Dundas Valley School of Art.

Steinberg and his wife, Cecile, a senior psychometrist at the McMaster University Medical Centre and current co-chair of Hamilton UJA women's division, have two daughters and two grandchildren.

Tribute dinner chair will be William Morris.

Jewish community workers honored at UJA luncheon

TORONTO — The tables were turned recently when nearly 200 Jewish community workers received praise from the volunteers whom they like to honor.

The United Jewish Appeal's Community Division, chaired by Stuart Razin, sponsored a luncheon to recognize the $81,000 raised by Lipa Green Building employees.

"A luncheon like this has never been done before," said campaign associate Avrum Rosensweig. "It's been a long time coming and it reminded a lot of people about why they chose to work in the Jewish community."

The Lipa Green Building houses UJA, the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and many of the agencies they support. The Lipa Green campaign was directed by Shari Springer.

Poli-sci course lets students learn about Israel, Canada

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two students spending their post-high school year studying in Israel will learn first-hand about the Canadian and Israeli political systems.

The Mizrachi of Canada Political Science Internship Program was inaugurated recently at a brunch at Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation in Thornhill.

Those chosen will spend the summer with York North MP Maurizio Bevilacqua and Vaughan councillor Bernie Green.

They will have the opportunity to be on the floor of the House of Commons in Ottawa, to work in Bevilacqua's constituency office and to assist Green at Vaughan Council.

During their year in Israel, they will be taken under the wing of Zevulan Hammer, leader of Mafdal, the Religious Zionist Party.

They will sit in on sub-committee meetings, work in Hammer's office, act as aides on the Knesset floor, learn how to research current issues to help in debate and study past issues at the Archives of Religious Zionism.

At the brunch, St. Paul's MP Barry Campbell, one of only three Jewish federal members of Parliament, presented a plaque to Bevilacqua honoring him for taking part in the program, while Vaughan Mayor Lorna Jackson presented one to Green.

Bevilacqua praised the "commitment of Jews to build a better community, not just for themselves, but for the whole community."

Young people, he said, face challenging times, especially with fewer social and economic opportunities.

"The internship will allow them to learn in a practical way what they learn in political science books."

Green said he was looking forward to passing on his "experience and excitement" to the students.

"Perhaps they won't take the system for granted as so many of us do."

Guest speaker Eliyahu Kanovsky, professor of economics at Bar-Ilan University, slammed the often-stated belief that the success of the peace process is dependent on the prospect of economic prosperity for Arab countries.

He cited poor economic policies, massive corruption, gaping inequalities between rich and poor in the Arab world, the rise of Islamic fundamentalism and internecine conflicts between Arab states, as factors which will undermine any peace effort or treaties. None of these factors, he said, have any real relation to the situation with Israel.

Graduating high school seniors eligible

Israel, he said, must work in terms of long-term, step by step policies, as it has been doing with Jordan and to some extent with Syria.

Greetings were brought to the gathering of nearly 200 by Arieh Glustein, chairman of the board of the host congregation; Jack Kahn, national president of Mizrachi; Kurt Rothschild, chair of the World Zionist Movement; and Dror Zeigerman, consul general of Israel.

Rabbi Baruch Taub of BAYT gave a dvar Torah.

Rabbi Menachem Gopin, vice-president of Mizrachi of Canada, told The CJN that any high school senior who is graduating this June and is going to study at an insitute of higher learning in Israel is eligible to apply to the program.

They must submit an essay of at least 250 words, two recommendations from a rabbi, teacher, counsellor or school principal, an acceptance letter from an institute of higher learning in Israel, and a list of activities on behalf of the State of Israel.

Those chosen for the program receive a return ticket to Israel and an honorarium of $500, he added.

Bank of Israel cuts interest rates by 1.5 per cent

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — There was good news on the Israeli economic front last week when interest rates dropped by 1.5 per cent and inflation seemed to be dropping.

Fearing high interest rates would bring on a recession, the government approved additional budget and tax cuts the Bank of Israel had demanded in return for immediately shaving interest rates by 1.5 per cent.

The Tel Aviv Stock Exchange rose by more than six per cent after the measures were announced.

The cabinet adopted Finance Minister Avraham Shohat's proposal to reduce the annual budget and tax base by NIS 1.2 billion each, although it only translates to a tax cut of NIS 400 million and shrinks spending by NIS 900 million this year. (NIS 3 is approximately $1 US). Shohat's package included as part of the tax cuts the previously cancelled capital gains tax, which was estimated to bring in NIS 500 million in annual revenues.

The budget cut is actually lower than the figure announced because, as it will only take effect in April, it will cover nine months this year.

In return, Bank of Israel Governor Jacob Frenkel announced that the central bank would bring down interest rates to 14.8 per cent on its loans to commercial banks.

The move will lead to an immediate drop in the cost of bank overdrafts and loans, and will lower the interest banks pay customers on their deposits.

Since the beginning of the year, the Treasury and the business sector have demanded that the central bank lower interest rates, fearing high rates would slow down the economy and push it into recession.

After the announcement, Shohat said the main goal of the steps taken "is to assure economic growth of five per cent this year and to preserve present employment levels."

Meanwhile, February's consumer price index rose 0.2 per cent, as falling produce and clothing prices brought inflation down to Western levels. It was the second month in a row the index rose only 0.2 per cent.

"As long as fruit and vegetable and clothing prices together contribute -0.5 per cent to the index, we can say we have reached European inflation levels," said Capital Holdings' chief economist Jonathan Katz.

The Bank of Israel was quick to take credit for the moderate index. It is "an additional indication that the Bank of Israel's firm policy in its fight against inflation has borne fruit," it said in a statement.

But the bank made it clear the battle is not won

"A balanced policy must be pursued to achieve the government's inflation goal of eight to eleven per cent," it said.

Mideast prosperity examined

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Peace in the Middle East will not bring economic prosperity to the region, a leading Israeli economist said at a recent seminar.

Prof. Eliyahu Kanovsky, senior research associate at BESA Centre for Strategic Studies and professor of economics at Bar-Ilan University, said the peace process is irrelevant to economic growth in the Middle East; such growth can only take place, he said, if Arab countries overhaul their economies.

The nationalization of industry in such countries as Egypt and Syria is inefficient. They need to adopt more effective economic strategies, such as increased privatization of industry, to increase productivity, Kanovsky said.

Oil-rich countries like Saudi Arabia have never used their profits to develop economic infrastructures, nor did they invest their profits wisely, he said.

"If they had invested in the West, they would be collecting dividends, but there was military corruption and they built crazy buildings they didn't need. There was massive waste."

Kanovsky said Saudi Arabia could strengthen its economy by putting an end to massive corruption, cutting back on military spending, reducing subsidies, and encouraging university students to get jobs outside of the "bloated" civil service, even if they have to do manual labor.

Kanovsky said such policies were adopted by Israel and have increased the country's productivity — the economy is now growing at the rate of six to seven per cent a year. This growth was not tied to peace, he said, but to the reorganization of the Israeli economy.

"Israel pulled itself up by its bootstraps in 1985," he said. "There was a whole restructuring of the country. The restructuring was painful, subsidies (to industry) were abolished and there was high unemployment."

Proponents of peace say it will lead to the establishment of a Middle East free trade zone, but Kanovsky disagreed, saying such a trade zone would not materialize because the Arab countries fear economic domination by the more industrially developed Israel.

He said there is little incentive for Israel to develop the trade zone because Arab markets are economically small, in comparison to those in Western Europe.

Prof. Eliyahu Kanovsky

While peace may improve Israeli-Arab relations, Arabs do not want Israel to help them expand their economies, Kanovsky said. "They resent foreign intervention by any foreigner. This does not engender good will."

Kanovsky also discussed the rise of Islamic fundamentalism, linking it to the oil crash of the mid-'80s, when many Arab workers who had been employed during the oil boom lost their jobs.

He said those people who experienced a significant decline in their standard of living were very susceptible to fundamentalism.

Kanovsky predicted further growth in fundamentalism if Arab governments fail to adopt more viable economic policies.

Kanovsky's seminar was sponsored by the Institute for International Affairs of B'nai Brith Canada, BESA Centre for Strategic Studies, Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University and the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce.

El Al sale should be delayed

JERUSALEM — The sale of El Al should be delayed until it has improved its profitability, so it will not be sold at bargain basement prices, Knesset economics committee chair Gideon Patt said last week.

El Al managing director Rafi Harlev retorted that the company would not survive unless it is sold. "The company has more or less used up whatever credit it can obtain or repay on the international market," Harlev said. However, he added, it desperately needs capital, because if it is still to be around in 20 years, it must double its fleet and replace half its existing planes — which means it must buy an average of 1½ planes a year.

Toys "R" Us interested in Israeli market

JERUSALEM — Representatives of retail giant Toys "R" Us will attend the Isra-Toy exhibition at the Tel Aviv Fairgrounds this week.

The company intends to study the local toy market and make an initial order for the first Israeli branch, which is scheduled to open this summer. Businessman Leon Koffler of SuperPharm is the local licensee for Toys "R" Us.

Number of job seekers increases

JERUSALEM — The number of job seekers increased by 2.7 per cent in February over the previous month, the Israeli Labor and Social Affairs Ministry reported last week.

Some 104,800 people registered with the Employment Services' various offices last month, about the same number as in January. However, those numbers were adjusted to 101,800 and 99,200, respectively, because of seasonal factors. There was no change in the number of new immigrants seeking work, with new immigrants making up 7.2 per cent of the job seekers, or 6,438.

Book tells managers how to cut company costs

By JOSEPH SERGE
CJN Business Editor

TORONTO— Each week countless books and other business-related products pile on my desk. In an effort to clean up the clutter I thought I'd review some of them.

180+ Ways to Cut Business Costs by Reuben Sokol (CCH Canadian Limited) is an excellent book for business managers and professionals.

Even though, depending on whom you talk to, the recession appears to be over, cost management continues to be important for businesses of all sizes. Sokol lists the ways a company can save money..

For example, when printing remember rush jobs cost more. Always plan your printing needs in advance. Also, printing 10 per cent extra copies is cheaper in the longrun than reprinting the same 10 per cent later due to high set up costs.

The old proverb — penny wise and pound foolish — is true for business costs. For example, Sokol points out that cutting advertising costs when business is down only leads to a vicious cycle. "When advertising is cut 20 per cent in response to sluggish sales, sales soon fall another 20 per cent."

Sokol advises business manangers to be aware of fraudulent sales techniques. One technique is for a supplier to send expensive supplies like toner to the receptionist saying it was ordered and sending an invoice with proof of receipt to accounts payable.

"This scam takes advantage of the inherent bureaucracy in medium-size companies. Therefore set up an approved list of suppliers to prevent unauthorized shipments. Any shipment not on this list should be quickly returned."

Also discussing ways to cut costs on travel, purchases, rent and energy 180+ Ways is a great book for business managers feeling the pinch of rising costs and lower revenues.

If your boss doesn't read Sokol's book, you might find him or her cutting costs the easiest (though not necessarily the most productive) way: Downsizing.

If this is the case Frances Quittel's Fire Power: Everything you need to know before and after you lose your job (Ten Speed Press) might be for you.

Fire Power is a guide book which helps one go through all the steps involved in knowing you're getting fired to getting a job. The book is filled with case studies, charts, quotes, cartoons and at times is more of a work book than a text book.

When someone gets fired the first reaction is normally an emotional one: "They can't do this to me, I'll sue." Quittel advises against this. "This is usually not an effective exit strategy because: You have probably not been discriminated against or treated in the very specific ways that would form the basis of a successful lawsuit. (And) suing is extremely draining, time-consuming, and costly."

If you do think you have a case, Quittel advises on picking an attorney. Never pick one out of the phonebook, if possible get a referral, she says. She lists a chart showing how to determine how much to claim for damages in a lawsuit.

A chapter on interview tips is helpful in today's job market which Quittel says, "is a fiercely competitive one. There are simply fewer new openings to start out with and more people competing for each one."

Fire Power uses an example from Jewish history to explain how employer-employee negotiation is a key part of improving severance packages. Just as the interaction between Moses and Pharaoh is a highly ritualized "dance" with a limited number of steps and responses, understanding what goes on in negotiation and preparing for predictable responses can help improve your negotiating results.

One problem for Canadian readers is all the case studies and geographical references are American and may not have any bearing on Canadian laws and regulations.

If you're like me and haven't filed your income tax return yet CanTax T1 Tax Return Software will make your job a lot easier.

Approximately 11,000 of Canada's leading tax-preparation services and over 50,000 taxpayers use CanTax software to prepare more than three million tax returns annually.

The 1994 version of T1 includes all Revenue Canada's Feb.22, 1994 budget changes plus all other changes introduced before Jan.15, 1995.

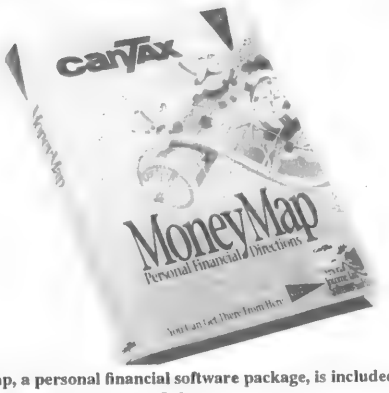
The user-friendly software allows you to file your income tax on a desktop screen. The user guide is easy to understand (almost easier than the instructions the government sends you), with diagrams on each screen to show you what your screen should look like.

T1 can process all types of returns for as many people as you like. Returns can be e-mailed to the government or printed out and mailed. It can print duplicates of Revenue Canada forms on dot-matrix or laser printers.

You can also do your spouse's return simultaneously and T1 automatically calculates all credits and deductions. If you want to do your own math, T1 has a built-in calculator you can call up to the screen.

T1 requires an IBM or compatible PC and runs on Microsoft Windows 3.1 or greater. Seven-day, 24-hour support is available.

Now if only it can speed up the government's processing of my claim so I get my refund faster.



Money Map, a personal financial software package, is included in the newly-released Tax Return Software.

Redstone Pictures

By SYLVIA PAPERNICK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — It's no surprise that Redstone Pictures produces quality videos.

With qualified technicians, state-of-the-art equipment and conscientious staff, the results are bound to be exceptional. Redstone owner and operator Richard Saunders strives to maintain this quality in all videos — wedding, corporate or promotional.

The company, which began in affiliation with photographer Hudson Taylor in 1989, was formed in 1992. Redstone Pictures is especially known for its unobtrusively and tastefully done wedding videos. Saunders says each client can have "whatever effect your heart desires. [It can be] a window onto themselves."

He believes a video should reflect people's values, and so he meets with the client and shows off his equipment well before beginning. His is a personalized approach, with prices on a par with other videographers.

Redstone Pictures uses the new non-linear equipment, which works faster and allows for more control in editing. Totally digital, the system became available in March and Saunders bought the 23rd unit. In addition to standard video, Saunders can also output laser disks.

With the new technology, a shot can be enhanced by laying music underneath it, or adding the click of a camera. What may at first seem to be a boring photo session can appear romantic and touching when set up properly.

Redstone Pictures has produced corporate videos for Paul Slavens Real Estate, the Jerusalem Foundation and Finesse. Redstone Pictures has also donated its services to charitable causes, like this year's United Jewish Appeal campaign, for which Saunders and his team wrote, produced, shot and edited the launch videos. Saunders referred to the experience as "life affirming." Redstone Pictures has also worked on videos for the Reena Foundation, the Jewish Community Centre and Jewish Family & Child Services.

"Our successes were built on the shoulders of the community. [The Jewish] community didn't get to be what it is without charity," Saunders said.

Allegations link Tobiass to civilian deaths

Wiesenthal asked the Canadian embassy in Vienna to forward the letter "to the competent Canadian authorities."

Allegations against Tobiass and the three others named in Wiesenthal's letter were published in a Sept. 28, 1966 article by journalist Peter Lust in The Canadian Jewish Chronicle.

Tobiass, an 84-year-old widower, last week was informed that the immigration department is seeking to strip him of his Canadian citizenship and deport him for knowingly concealing his past.

Documents filed in Federal Court allege Tobiass had been a member of Arajs Kommando, a Latvian-led death squad, between 1941 and 1943, and had participated "in the execution of civilians during that time."

They also claim Tobiass was a member of the Waffen SS from 1943 to 1945.

Government lawyers will file more detailed charges against Tobiass, as well as a list of witnesses, on April 3, Roger White, a spokesman for the Immigration Department, told The CJN.

Jewish organizations hailed the new moves but were dismayed that it has taken the government 29 years to act against Tobiass.

The case "sounds like tokenism. I'm not sure we have much to celebrate," a disappointed Sol Littman, director of the Canadian Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, told The CJN last week.

Littman said Wiesenthal's 1966 letter to the Canadian embassy in Austria was forwarded to officials in Ottawa, and the ambassador asked whether he should meet the Nazi hunter to obtain details on war criminals living in Canada.

"There was no response for some eight months. Finally, the ambassador was told to stay away from Wiesenthal because if they exchanged information, he [Wiesenthal] would expect something in return," said Littman, citing documents in the National Archives.

Littman added that when he asked federal officials why this latest round against suspected war criminals has begun with Tobiass, he was told it was because of the heinousness of the alleged crimes and the availability of witnesses.

According to Aaron Breitbart, a researcher at the Wiesenthal Centre in Los Angeles, about 75,000 Latvian Jews died at the hands of the Nazis.

Breitbart said an estimated 30,000 of those were murdered by the dreaded Arajs Kommando, a unit of about 400 Latvian volunteers with a documented record of particularly vicious killings of civilians during the Nazi occupation of Latvia.

Breitbart sent The CJN excerpts from Political Refugees Unmasked, a book printed by the Latvian State Publishing House in 1965, containing explosive allegations against Tobiass from supposed eyewitnesses.

Breitbart said just because the book was printed by a Communist regime does not necessarily mean it was anti-Nazi propaganda.

Congress president Irving Abella last week accused a "slothful" Ottawa of dragging its feet and showing "absolutely no will, no determination and no concern" for the Nazi war crimes dossier.

B'nai Brith Canada commended the government and said it looks forward to the other three cases.

Proceedings against Tobiass and the other suspects are "a travesty of justice," announced the Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association.

"The token deportation of a handful of such criminals does nothing to correct [a] historical miscarriage of justice [in which] hundreds, perhaps as many as 2,000 [Nazi war criminals] will remain in Canada," association vice-chair Sabina Citron said in a statement.

The government scored low on its handling of current problems.

Compared with 40 per cent who say it functioned "well" or "very well" last year, only 29 per cent give it high marks today, with the remainder describing its functioning as "poor."

The public's attitude toward terrorism has stiffened, the survey indicated, with 41 per cent saying negotiations with the PLO should be stopped because of terrorism.

On the other hand, 33 per cent believe terror would stop if the negotiations were successfully concluded.

Golan Heights concessions

Fully 50 per cent felt that negotiations with Hamas are not feasible; 15 per cent favor negotiations, and 35 per cent say they would support negotiations if Hamas renounced terrorism.

Some 75 per cent of respondents think a Palestinian state will be established in the coming years — twice the number who felt that way five years ago.

On the question of returning territories, some 50 per cent — the same as in previous surveys — said they oppose any territorial concessions on the Golan Heights. But 61 per cent predict the heights will be handed to Syria within 10 years.

Sixty-seven per cent said the security zone in Lebanon protects northern settlements, while 33 per cent feel it has cost too many lives and does not provide adequate security.

PASSOVER FOODS

Chometz: use it or lose it

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Purim is over and Passover is on its way. Let the cleaning games begin. We have opening ceremonies in our house, just like the beginning of the Olympics only ours is done with the flourishing of mops and pails and a dust buster, instead of the flags of many nations. My children then sing the annual ode to the yearly BIG cleaning of their closets: "But I just cleaned it last year, Mom." It's sung loudly and often and always with a smile.

Everyone helps. I get the kitchen and my husband gets the rest of the house. It's the only time of the year that my husband has an intimate relationship with our vacuum cleaner. He says he enjoys helping me; I think he just likes making all those patterns on the carpet.

My kids just LOVE pitching in and helping me get the kitchen ready (yes, I know, my nose is growing. Actually they love to help clean the pantry. They can always be counted on to find those leftover candies, cookies and crackers that must be eaten and eaten immediately, because throwing them out would be a waste and it's a sin to waste food. (Thousands of dollars for a religious education and this is what I get!)

My biggest task, at this point, is trying to figure out how to use up all those half boxes, bottles and containers of pasta, flour and condiments that I need to get rid of.

The following recipes will help use up the leftovers and clear out those shelves. Most are so simple you'll use them even when you don't need to get rid of chometz.

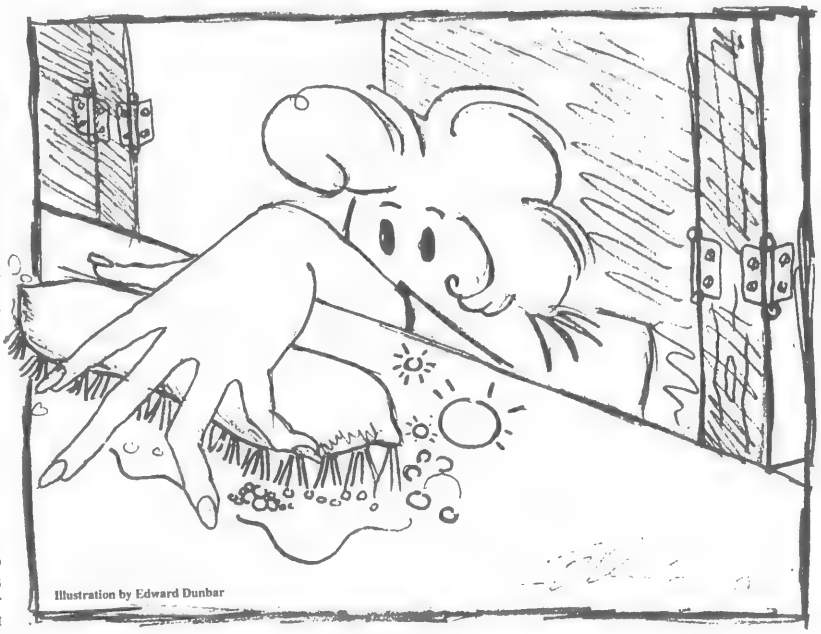

Illustration by Edward Dunbar

CHEESE-MUSHROOM STRATA

4 eggs lightly beaten
1½ c. pareve chicken bouillon (follow directions on container to reconstitute bouillon)
½ c. sour cream
2 t. kosher Dijon mustard
4 c. bread, cubed
2 c. cheddar cheese
½ c. chopped mushrooms

In a large bowl, beat together eggs, bouillon, sour cream and mustard. Stir in bread cubes and mushrooms. Pour into greased two-quart baking dish (8x12) and let set at least 4 hours or overnight. Bake uncovered at 350 for 50 to 60 min. Let stand 5 min. before serving. Garnish with sliced tomatoes. Serves 6 to 8.

FAST AND EASY ALFREDO

1 8 oz. pkg. cream cheese, cubed
¾ c. grated kosher Parmesan cheese
½ c. margarine or butter
½ c. milk
8 oz. fettucini, cooked and drained

In a large saucepan, combine cream cheese, parmesan cheese, margarine and milk; stir over low heat until smooth. Add fettucini and toss. Serves 4.

CORN AND VEGETABLE MEDLEY

1 can cream corn
½ c. milk
2 c. broccoli florets
1 c. sliced carrots
1 c. cauliflowerets
½ c. cheddar cheese (optional)

In a saucepan combine cream corn and milk. Bring to a boil, stirring often and then add vegetables. Reduce heat, cover and cook over low heat about 20 min. or until vegetables are tender. Stir often. Stir in cheese. Heat through. Serves 6. (You can substitute frozen vegetables for the fresh. You just have to reduce the cooking time.) Garnish with leftover chow mein noodles.

TACO SNACK MIX

4 c. cereal (nothing small like rice crispies or grape nuts)
4 c. small pretzels
4 c. tortilla chips
1 pkg. taco seasoning mix, kosher
¼ c. margarine, melted

In a large bowl combine cereal, pretzels, tortilla chips, and taco seasoning. Drizzle with margarine and toss to coat well. To store, use air tight container. Makes 12 cups. This can be cut in half or doubled.

CHOCOLATE BREAD PUDDING

2 oz. unsweetened chocolate
2 c. milk
1 c. bread crumbs, solidly packed
2 eggs
¾ c. sugar
½ t. cinnamon

Place the milk and chocolate in a saucepan. Heat slowly, stirring often and constantly until the chocolate has melted. Remove from heat, stir in the bread crumbs and let sit one hour. Preheat oven to 350. In a medium bowl, beat eggs lightly, add the sugar and cinnamon. Stir in the bread mixture and then pour into a greased 6-cup baking dish. Bake pudding, uncovered in a hot water bath for about 1 hour or until set (like custard). Serve warm or cold, with whipped cream. Serves 4.

Delectable kosher recipes from around the world

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

One of the fascinating parts of looking over Jewish cookbooks is finding out how communities all over the world adapt local cuisine, foods and techniques to kosher requirements.

The Kosher Gourmet; the 92nd Street Y Kosher Cooking School, edited by Batia Plotch and Patricia Cobe (Fawcett Columbine, 1992) describes itself, accurately, as "a tantalizing cornucopia of more than 200 delectable kosher recipes from around the world," as taught at the well-known cooking school at the 92nd Street YM-YWHA in New York City.

Each chapter is devoted to a particular ethnic area. Many cookbooks have recipes from Hungary, Russia and Morocco; it is exciting to see Japanese, Vietnamese, Caribbean and Thai.

So not only can you learn how to make chicken with forty cloves of garlic from France, Russian pirogen and Moroccan chicken couscous, but roasted onions from the Yucatan, Japanese stir-fried noodles and vegetables and spiced fish cakes from Burma.

Most of the ingredients are fairly easily accessible in Toronto kosher stores or supermarkets.

There are also suggested menus (don't we all hanker after an English afternoon tea, complete with potted fish, lemon curd, Irish soda bread and trifle?), holiday meals, extensive descriptions of local food customs and a chapter on kosher wine.

PASSOVER MINA
(Serves 8)

¼ cup vegetable oil
1 medium onion, peeled and chopped
1 lb. ground beef
salt and pepper to taste
6 matzahs
¾ cup chopped parsley
3 to 4 green onions, chopped
6 to 7 eggs, well beaten
1 medium potato, cooked and mashed (opt)

In a large skillet, heat oil over medium-high heat. Add onion; saute 5 to 10 min., until golden. Add ground beef. Saute 5 min. longer or until it loses its red color. Add ¾ cup water and salt and pepper. Reduce heat to low. Cover and simmer 10 min., or until beef is tender. Remove from heat and let cool.

Preheat oven to 400. Grease 13 x 9 in. baking dish.

Dip matzahs in water until wet but not soaked. Squeeze out excess water and break matzahs into pieces.

In large bowl, combine matzahs, beef mixture, parsley, green onions, 6 eggs and salt and pepper to taste. Mix well and transfer to prepared baking dish.

In small bowl, blend mashed potato with remaining egg. Spread evenly over meat mixture if desired. Bake 45 min. or until golden brown.

*Beef mixture can be cooked ahead of time and refrigerated until you are ready to prepare mina.

MATZAH PANCAKES IN HONEY SAUCE (CHREMSLACH)
(Makes 3 dozen pancakes)

1 cup matzah meal
½ cup chopped almonds
1 tsp. ground cinnamon
1 tsp. sugar
¼ tsp. salt
1/8 tsp. ginger
1 cup sweet Passover wine or water
4 eggs, beaten
vegetable oil for frying
12-oz. jar honey

In medium bowl, combine matzah meal, almonds, cinnamon, sugar, salt and ginger. Stir in wine or water and eggs until well blended. If mixture looks too thin, let stand about 10 min. to thicken.

Coat bottom of large skillet with about ¼ inch of oil. Place over medium-high heat and heat until hot. Drop batter by tablespoonfuls into hot oil to make pancakes about 1 inch in diameter. Fry pancakes a few at a time for 5 to 8 min., until brown on both sides, turning once. Drain on paper towels. Repeat with remaining batter until all is used up.

In medium saucepan, bring honey to a boil over medium-high heat. Remove from heat. Add pancakes, stirring to coat all with honey. Serve warm. Store leftovers in refrigerator.

When you put it all together, Clover Leaf means quality.

Together, these symbols stand as your guarantee of uncompromising quality. It's the standard you demand for your Kosher table, and the one that we demand of the Clover Leaf name.

Hungarian book misses the mark

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

There is a story about a European housekeeper briefly employed by a friend of the family. The woman's cooking skills were supposedly top-notch.

For dinner the first night, she boiled potatoes and served them without fanfare — two for the father, one for the mother and half a potato per child. That was all. She was on her way home by the end of the week.

Unfortunately, Linda F. Radke's collection of Hungarian-American family recipes, That Hungarian's in my Kitchen (Five Star Publications, 1994), has little more to recommend it by way of culinary accomplishment than the short-lived housekeeper.

The 125 recipes are poorly written, poorly organized and bear no resemblance to the delicious Hungarian-Jewish cooking I grew up on. Radke gives us plain boiled spuds when we want rakott krumpli, the richly scalloped potato dish made extra sinful with slices of hard-boiled egg tucked between layers.

At best the recipes in That Hungarian's in my Kitchen are unappetizing, at worst erroneous. The cookbook does nothing to champion gulyas, the Hungarian culinary treasure which in North America has become the sloppy stew known as "goulash."

"It seems sad that the very dish which has taken Hungary's name to the ends of the earth should be so misrepresented," laments Fred Macnicol, author of Hungarian Cookery.

True gulyas is a meal-in-a-bowl soup made from beef, peppers and potatoes, tangy with paprika and thick with egg dumplings. Radke's bland recipe is in the section on stews.

And what would Elek Magyar, the Hungarian Fannie Farmer, make of the cheese casserole with pineapple bits?

Radke tells us that some of the recipes in That Hungarian's in my Kitchen "started out Hungarian and became Americanized. Others started out American and were then touched by Hungarian hands." That would explain the recipes for chop suey, blondies and especially the vegetarian dishes, since Hungarian food is notoriously reliant on meat.

Try these recipes from the Hungarians in my kitchen instead. The scalloped potatoes or the gulyas stand on their own, needing only a green salad to make a complete meal.

JUDY LYSY'S RAKOTT KRUMPLI (SCALLOPED POTATOES)

(Serves 6)

6 medium Yukon Gold potatoes
3 hard boiled eggs, sliced
½ small onion, chopped fine
1 tsp. margarine
2 tbsp. light sour cream
paprika for garnish
salt and pepper to taste

Boil potatoes in their skins. When cool enough to handle, peel and cut crosswise into 1-inch slices.

Preheat oven to 325 degrees. Grease a deep ovenproof casserole with margarine and cover bottom with potato slices. Sprinkle with chopped onion and egg slices. Season with salt and pepper and dot with sour cream. Repeat layers with remaining ingredients, ending with potatoes. Dot with sour cream. Bake at 325 for 50 minutes uncovered. In last 15 minutes, sprinkle with paprika.

MARIA PATAKI'S GULYAS

(Serves 6-8)

1 tbsp. oil
1 large onion, chopped
2 cloves garlic, minced
2 tsp. paprika
1 tsp. Passover red pepper puree (optional)
1 banana pepper
1 tomato
1 lb. stewing beef, cut in ½ inch cubes
10 cups hot water
4 cubes beef stock concentrate
2 large Yukon Gold potatoes, cubed

In a 3-quart saucepan, fry onion in oil over low heat until golden, about 10 minutes. Add garlic and paprika, cooking just until paprika becomes fragrant. Do not let it burn. Add whole pepper, tomato, beef, water, pepper puree (if using) and stock concentrate. Bring to boil, cover and simmer 1 hour. In the last 15 minutes, add potatoes and cook through.

Books amuse kids during holiday clean-up

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

In the midst of the chaos that surrounds Passover preparations, when the kids are clamoring for the attention you just haven't the time (or energy) to give, it's nice to have new books for them to read and enjoy — ones that show the meaning of the holiday artistically and in a fun way.

Such a book is Fran Manushkin's The Matzah That Papa Brought Home (Scholastic Press, 1995).

Using the repetitionary technique of Chad Gadya, the book begins with "This is the matzah that Papa brought home" with a picture of a home overflowing with shopping bags, moving to "this is the feast that Mama made with the matzah that Papa brought home" and concluding with the traditional end to the seder, hugging, opening the door and so on, back to the matzah that Papa brought home.

Stomachs growl, pictures are shoved askew during the frantic search for the afikomen, a young girl hesitantly opens the door for Elijah.

Although Ned Bittinger's pictures may appear dark and a little formal for the very young child, they are effective and realistic.

This is a lovely book, that will surely become a "traditional" Pesach activity.

Find The Matzah That Papa Brought Home at Jewish book stores.

Onions add an oomph to most dishes

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

There are some misguided souls who don't like onions in cooking. To them, I can only offer my sympathy.

Onions add an oomph to food, an earthiness and a "comfort-feel" without which the table would be a poorer place.

This is not just mindless babble — it was brought to mind by a splendid new cookbook Onions, Onions, Onions, by Linda and Fred Griffith (Charles Publishing, 1994).

Besides dynamite recipes, the book is a wealth of onion information and lore. You can find out what those mysterious ingredients called scallions, shallots and Vidalias are, what songs about onions have been written (did you know that the Beatles recorded a Glass Onion on their White Album?) and what Craig Claiborne suggests to avoid tears when chopping onions. (Hold a small, clean damp cloth between the teeth, tightly as possible.)

The recipes tend to be fairly involved, and are definitely not for the cook wanting a hurry-up meal. But sometimes it's worth the effort.

POTATOES AND ONIONS BOULANGERE

(Serves 4)

1½ lbs. colored ripe tomatoes (red, yellow, orange)
6-10 cherry tomatoes
¾ cup finely diced sweet or red onion
10 basil leaves, finely julienned
⅓ cup oil
freshly ground pepper
3 tbsp. red-wine vinegar, kosher for Passover kosher salt

Coarsely dice all tomatoes but cherry tomatoes and place in a bowl. Slice cherry tomatoes and add to others. Add onion, basil, oil and pepper. Mix and let stand for 30 minutes.

Just before serving, add vinegar and season with pepper and salt to taste. Stir gently, and serve.

TOMATO AND ONION SALAD

(Serves 6)

1 tbsp. butter or pareve margarine
5 large russet potatoes, peeled and thinly sliced
1 large white onion, thinly sliced kosher salt and pepper
5-6 tbsp. oil
1 cup boiling water or chicken stock

Preheat oven to 325. Butter a 10-inch round baking dish. Arrange ⅓ of the potatoes in an even layer, cover with ⅓ of the onions, sprinkle with salt and pepper and drizzle with about 1½ tbsp. oil. Repeat 2 more times.

Add enough boiling water or stock to reach about ¾ of the way up the sides of the dish. Drizzle top with remaining oil; sprinkle with more salt and pepper.

Place the baking dish in the oven and bake for 1¼ hours, adding more hot water or stock at the edges if potatoes look too dry, until potatoes are very tender and top is browned.

New Haggadah uses cartoon characters

Every Pesach brings new editions of the Haggadah, and this year sees one of the best.

The Doodle Haggadah puts Israeli artist Reudor's charming cartoon charactors in the middle of Pesach cleaning, listening to a grandfather reading commentaries, in the middle of the 10 plagues (I liked the little sister chortling at her big brother "So ... how d'you like being the oldest NOW, big shot?") and as an Israeli soldier reading a special Haggadah put together by Rabbi Shlomo Goren, former chief rabbi of the Israel Defence Force.

The pages are bordered in brightly colored abstract designs, and, together with the skillful use of color throughout and the clear type, make the whole book a thing of beauty.

Added to the traditional Pesach ritual are pages discussing happenings on other Passovers, customs of different Jewish communities and descriptions of Haggadot through the ages.

Get (heart) smart

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

You know the routine: you go to the doctor and are told to shape up or else.

You read in virtually every magazine on the face of the earth that cholesterol, fat and refined sugars are bad for you.

Or your children take you aside and tell you sternly that you should not eat that succulent rib steak.

Are you stuck with cottage cheese and lettuce for the rest of your life? (Not, by the way, that there is anything wrong with cottage cheese and lettuce, but glamorous they aren't.)

Help is on the way. Get ahold of two great new cookbooks, Bonnie Stern's Simply HeartSmart Cooking (Random House, 1994) and Rose Reisman Brings Home Light Pasta (Macmillan Canada, 1994).

Both are full of tips for healthy eating, ways to make meals and individual recipes more wholesome as well as more healthy, and dynamite recipes.

As well, both are intented to benefit health organizations. Stern's is co-published by the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Canada, while sales of Reisman's book benefit the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation (CBCF).

(For those who purchase her book from the CBCF, $10 will be donated to the organization. If it is purchased from a bookstore, 10 per cent of the purchase price will go to the foundation).

Neither book is kosher, but a majority of recipes in both books can be adapted with little effort. There is, for instance, (and will someone tell me why not?) no kosher rice vinegar available in Canada, but kosher wine or balsamic vinegar can be substituted.

Bonnie Stern tends to create elegant recipes, often with a fairly complicated set of instructions and ingredients. Simply HeartSmart Cooking is no different. Auntie Sadie sure never made sesame-crusted salmon on greens, or the dessert concoction of peaches, pineapple, plums and berries redolent with ginger, cardamom, coriander and rum, but don't let that put you off.

Recipes sound luscious and the liberal use of colour illustrations makes you want to dash into the kitchen pronto.

As in most "healthy" cookbooks, the emphasis is on fresh fruits and vegetables, pasta, fish and chicken, although there is some red meat as well — even a

Traditional recipes adapted for special diets

What is the answer to the age old question: "How do you meet the challenge of finding palatable recipes that meet the dietary guidelines for the eight-day Passover holiday?"

"That is simple — Passover Made Easy, the cookbook of the Emanuel Synaghogue sisterhood of West Hartford, CT," says Ellen Kaplan-Weingold, editor of the revised third edition.

Passover Made Easy combines traditional recipes with some newer low calorie, low fat, low cholesterol and vegetarian dishes.

"This edition shows you that traditional Passover recipes don't have to be laden with cholesterol," says Kaplan-Weingold.

The cookbook contains 340 recipes, and is enclosed in a washable vinyl three ring notebook. Recipes are appealingly presented and easy to prepare, with ingredients that are interesting but not so exotic that one would not ordinarily have them around the house during Pesach.

The sisterhood of this Conservative synagogue has also added sections dealing with Passover guidelines, and conversion and measurement charts for Passover ingredients.

The book is available for $15.95 (US). Postage and handling is $4 (US) for the first book and $2 (US) for each additional book. Payment will be accepted by cheque or money order made out to: Sisterhood of the Emanuel Synagogue, 160 Mohegan Drive, West Hartford, CT 06117, Attn: Cookbook.

Non-dairy fruit ices made for Pesach

The Metropolitan Ice Cream Company will once again be featuring a line of all natural, non-dairy, no fat, no cholesterol kosher for Passover fresh fruit ices in stores across Ontario.

"Every year we get bombarded with calls around this time inquiring about kosher for Passover items. As long as there is a demand, we will continue to produce," said Metropolitan president Michael Hurwich.

The Metropolitan Ice Cream staff has worked double shifts under the supervision of the Rabbinical Vaad Hakashruth in order to meet production deadlines.

The kosher for Passover ices are made with the same painstaking care used to make all other Metropolitan products. Hand-peeled fresh fruit from the Ontario Food Terminal make up more than 90 per cent of the contents, with a little water, a little sugar and fresh squeezed lemon juice for a natural preservative. "Nothing that can't be pronounced is ever found in any Metropolitan product," says a news release.

Metropolitan kosher for Passover ices will be available in 500 mL containers in the following flavors: Raspberry, Mango, Lemon, Pink Grapefruit and Strawberry.

The ices will be available at Loblaws, No Frills (Bathurst & Wilson, and Avenue Road), Miracle Mart, Highland Farms, Kosher City, Seafood Warehouse and several Dominions, among other stores.

No one can pass over our baskets.

It's easy to see why! Bursting with kosher for Passover gourmet packaged delicacies and decorated in festive fashion, they're a welcome guest at any seder. Call us today! And learn why people would cross the Red Sea to receive a Nutcracker Sweet gift.

FOOD FOR MONKEYS?

Cookbook designed for cost conscious

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

Every so often a cookbook comes along that becomes somewhat of a classic; something everyone has (or claims they have), everyone talks about and that becomes the basis for future books and cooking styles.

Second Helpings springs easily to mind.

Now, The Basic Shelf Cookbook (City of York Health Unit, originally published 1987, revised and updated 1994) appears to be one of those books.

This cookbook is designed, say the organizers, for those on a tight budget, young people just starting out, the elderly living alone, people with little food storage space and limited facilities, and those unable to shop much.

The introduction begins with a list of foods that should be kept on hand — such basics as rice, pasta, canned soups, fruits and vegetables, meat alternatives, skim milk powder and seasonings.

Each recipe then begins with those few fresh ingredients (like cheese, eggs or bread) necessary to supplement the basic shelf.

Cost per serving is also given, as is nutritional information, calories and the percentage of calories from fat.

Recipes are fairly simple, but tasty, easy to prepare and low-cost.

While this is not a kosher cookbook, the majority of the recipes either are acceptable or can be adapted for the kosher home.

The Basic Shelf Cookbook can be ordered from Nutrition Promotion Program (Cookbook Orders), City of York Health Unit, 504 Oakwood Ave., City of York, M6E 2X1.

These sample recipes can be used on Pesach.

California recipes use fresh fruits and vegetables

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

A colorful cover of sunshine yellow poppies, lush green lawn and a table set for an al fresco meal sets the tone of the delightful new cookbook of California recipes Around Our Table — California Cooks Kosher (Jewish Family Service of Los Angeles, 1994).

Not quite as exotic as some California cookbooks, it nevertheless uses effectively the fresh fruits and vegetables of the Pacific coast, persimmon, lime, hearts of palm, as well as the Mexican-influenced salsas, avocados and jalapeno pepper.

Many of the recipes are in accord with today's lighter lifestyle, grilled or barbecued, sauces with fruits and spices rather than fats.

Recipes are straightforward enough so that the cook is not frazzled before he or she begins, yet with enough challenge to keep up interest.

While there is not a particularly extensive selection of strictly Passover recipes, many of the regular selections can be used on this holiday.

PASSOVER CARROT TORTE
(Serves 10)

5 eggs, separated
1 cup sugar
1 cup raw carrots, grated
1½ cups ground almonds
½ cup potato starch
½ lemon, juice and grated rind
¼ tsp. cinnamon
1 tbsp. Passover liqueur (opt.)

Beat egg yolks with sugar until light and lemon colored. Add grated carrots, almonds, potato starch, lemon juice, rind and cinnamon. If desired, add 1 tbsp. liqueur.

Beat egg whites until stiff, fold into carrot mixture.

Grease 9-inch springform pan generously, pour mixture into pan and bake in 375 oven for 1 hour.

STIR-FRY BROCCOLI AND ASPARAGUS

(Serves 4)

2 tbsp. Passover oil
1 medium onion, thinly sliced
1 tbsp. shredded fresh ginger
3 cloves garlic, minced
3 cups broccoli, florets and trimmed stems
1 lb. asparagus, trimmed and cut in 2 inch pieces
2 tbsp. lemon juice
1½ tsp. sugar

In wok or large skillet, heat oil. Stir-fry onion, ginger, garlic and salt. Add broccoli and asparagus. Stir over high heat until well coated. Add lemon juice and sugar. Stir-fry 2 minutes longer, or until vegetables are crisp-tender.

Majestic Victoria hotel acquires a kosher kitchen

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

To most residents of very Anglo-Saxon Victoria, the word kosher once didn't mean much.

Stephanie Gilbert, a former Israeli who lives in Victoria with her husband Charles and family, has changed all that.

The staid old CP Empress Hotel, noted more for its afternoon teas and roast beef with Yorkshire pudding, now offers strictly kosher meals for large groups thanks to her. The latest kosher dinner there was the community's major social event, the Negev Dinner.

When the kosher kitchen was officially launched last October as a fundraiser for Congregation Emanu-El's building fund, the Victoria Times-Colonist newspaper ran a full page about the meaning of kosher and listed several recipes. It was a major occasion, attended by the lieutenant-governor, the mayor and other dignitaries.

So kosher is now in. Non-Jews who have attended kosher dinners think it's just great, and the higher profile is something Tourism Victoria couldn't buy for thousands of promotional dollars.

The kosher kitchen grew out of Hadassah-WIZO's Chocolate Sunday, of which Gilbert has been co-convenor and convenor for the past four years. In 1984, to get Chocolate Sunday off to an auspicious start, Gilbert organized a preview dinner at the Empress, featuring a menu with chocolate in every course.

"It was an incredibly wonderful evening," Gilbert told The CJN, "and it was great fun. But I noticed that many people chose a vegetarian dinner."

Stephanie Gilbert

She mentioned this to Marc Saunier, the hotel's food and beverage director. Saunier liked the idea of creating a kosher kitchen, something other CP hotels share. Rabbi A. Feigelstock, kashruth director of the Orthodox Rabbinical Council of British Columbia, and Rabbi Levy Teitelbaum of Vancouver were brought in to supervise the process.

Gilbert, who had grown up in an Orthodox home, helped explain to Saunier "when the rabbis talked too fast, or afterwards, I often had to explain what they really meant.

"But I learned a lot more of the 'whys' — which I hadn't known. I'd just done things my grandmother had done. I learned a lot from the rabbis so it was a great process for me."

It was an expensive proposition for the hotel, which decided to do meat dishes only with service for 320. That meant buying silverware, flatware, dishes, cooking untensils and all the other accoutrements up to Empress standards.

For the opening dinner, complete with matzah ball soup, everything worked well, said Gilbert, except someone forgot to order coolers for the wine.

As for Chocolate Sunday, a national Hadassah-WIZO project at which candy companies display and sell their wares, more than 7,000 attended the January event.

The Gilberts moved to Victoria in 1990 and Stephanie's first community effort was to cook the Passover seder for Congregation Emanu-El. She had been a cook at an Israeli army camp "so preparing the seder was no big deal."

Gilbert was born in England, brought up in Australia and made aliyah in 1961. Her first husband was killed in the Six Day War, leaving her with three children.

She was living in Tiberias when she met Charles, a major in the Canadian contingent of the United Nations patrol in the Golan Heights. When Charles was transferred back to Canada, they lived in Ottawa for five years and then came to Vancouver, Charles' hometown, and on to Victoria.

Gilbert keeps close ties with Israel. A son attends the Weizmann Institute and a daughter is at Hebrew University. Another son lives at home.

Gilbert has taught Hebrew at the synagogue school and is currently heading the synagogue's $1.5-million campaign to build a new school.

She loves Victoria and says "I found the niche that suits me ... and everybody."

Roasted root vegetables are part of this tantalizing dish.

The latest thing in vegetable preparation is roasting. Here are two excellent recipes from Simply HeartSmart Cooking that will impress even your kids with your sophisticated Passover table.

ROASTED ROSEMARY FRENCH FRIES

(Serves 6)

2 lbs. baking or sweet potatoes
1 tbsp. Passover oil
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
1 tbsp. chopped fresh rosemary, or
½ tsp. dried

Peel potatoes and cut into french-fry shapes. Soak in cold water for 30 min. if you want them extra crispy. Drain well and pat dry.

Toss potatoes with oil. Combine salt, pepper and rosemary and toss with potatoes.

Arrange potatoes in single layer on rack set over baking sheet. Bake in preheated 400 oven for 40 to 45 min, or until cooked and browned.

ROASTED ROOT VEGETABLES

(Serves 4 to 6)

1 lb. baking potatoes, scrubbed
1 lb. sweet potatoes, peeled
1 large carrot, peeled or scrubbed
1 parsnip, peeled
¼ lb. rutabaga, peeled
1½ tbsp. Passover oil
2 cloves garlic, minced
2 tbsp. chopped fresh rosemary, or
1 tsp. dried
½ tsp. salt
½ tsp. pepper

Cut vegetables into 1½-inch pieces. Place in cold water if they begin to discolor while you are preparing them. Drain vegetables well and pat dry.

Combine oil, garlic, rosemary, salt and pepper. Toss with vegetables.

Spread vegetables out in single layer on non-stick baking sheet or baking sheet lined with parchment paper. Bake in preheated 425 oven for 45 to 55 min., or until vegetables are browned and tender. Stir twice during cooking.

LCBO products for Pesach

The LCBO is offering more than 25 special products, in addition to its regularly available kosher listings, in time for Passover.

Among the choices available at selected LCBO stores are red, white and rose table wines from Israel, France, Italy, California and New York State. There are also liqueurs, vodka, a grape brandy and a sparkling wine. Prices for these products range from $5.95 to $16.85 for wines; $9.95 to $19.50 for spirits.

In addition, LCBO Vintage stores and Vintage sections in regular LCBO stores are offering five new premium kosher for Passover wines from Israel and California.

"These special kosher for Passover products are part of a larger program designed to meet the interests of specific communities and ethnic groups," explains Anne Hartley, director of Product Management. "To serve these special markets, and offer the widest possible product selection, the LCBO buys thousands of products from suppliers in more than 70 different countries."

tzimmes made with short ribs (flanken).

Stern also suggests stir-frying as a good way to cook, and many of her recipes feature that method of preparation.

The introduction is excellent, including the scientific basis for "heartsmart" eating, a discussion of heart disease in women, an explanation of the new Canadian Food Guide, and suggestions for creating a healthy diet.

There is even a chapter on preparing food with "eye appeal," the use of leftovers, and menus ranging from one for a teen party, a Passover seder (roast turkey breast with rosemary and garlic is a great change from the usual heavy meal), a romantic dinner for two, and, alas, even a World Series meal.

An extra and very much appreciated bonus is a statement of each recipe's Canadian Diabetes Association Food Choice Values.

Reisman's latest book follows close on the heels of her very popular Rose Reisman Brings Home Light Cooking.

Even those of us not quite adventurous enough to make our own pasta will enjoy such delicacies as orange and pineapple chicken stir fry with linguine, double-bean chili over rotini, or fettuccine with Indian tomato sauce, where curry powder and coriander change an Italian staple into an exotic novelty.

A useful chapter on The Complete Pasta Pantry gives tips on what kinds of cheeses are best for pasta, herbs, oils and tomatoes.

Again, chicken, veal and fish are used extensively in Reisman's book, but there are many dairy suggestions and even some vegetarian.

Mind you, I would like to try her hoisin beef (substitute London broil or perhaps second filet for the sirloin steak called for), red peppers and snow peas over fettucine, which combines Italian and Chinese cooking in an interesting and inviting way.

THICK AND RICH TOMATO SAUCE

From Rose Reisman

(This is intended to be served over pasta. On Passover, enjoy it over spaghetti squash, farfel, meatloaf, broiled chicken breasts or even large baked potatoes.)

1 tbsp. Passover oil
2 tsp. crushed garlic
½ cup chopped onions
½ cup chopped green pepper
½ cup chopped carrots
28 oz. tin crushed tomatoes
¼ cup Passover red wine
2 tbsp. tomato paste
1 bay leaf
1 tsp. dried oregano
1 tsp. dried basil

In large non-stick saucepan, heat oil. Saute garlic, onions, green peppers and carrots until softened, approximately 10 minutes.

Add tomatoes, wine, tomato paste, bay leaf, oregano and basil. Cover and simmer for approximately 20 min., stirring occasionally. Discard bay leaf.

The commandments of surviving a seder

To help this year's seder hosts survive the joys of hosting two dozen hungry guests in a three-room apartment, Jay Buchsbaum, vice-president of marketing for Royal Wine Corporation, offers the following suggestions:

Serve white wines instead of red wines. Wine is served throughout the seder ceremony, which can run from three to six hours in most homes. It is inevitable that wine will be spilt on the crowded table. White wine is easier to clean and less noticeable than red wine. Although many older Jews think of thick, sweet sacramental wines as traditional, there is no religious prohibition against using kosher white wine. White wines also tend to be more popular than red in America.

Set saucers next to each place setting. About 30 minutes into the seder ceremony each guest is required to dip a pinky into a cup of wine and spill a drop for each of the Ten Plagues, as they are communally recited. Individual saucers will provide guests with suggested targets, cutting down on unnecessary wine stains.

Create individual mini-seder plates. During the ceremony which proceeds the seder meal, guests are required to recite certain prayers and consume certain ceremonial foods. Often, at larger gatherings, the entire process breaks down several times as the food items are prepared and passed around to each guest. A better way is to place a bread and butter plate or salad plate at each setting and have the ceremonial food items pre-made and adorning the plates.

Cut down on traffic to the kitchen. The seder night runs quite long and quite late. There is no need to prolong it unnecessarily. If serving soup, leave space for a trivit on the table and bring out the soup in a toureen with a ladle. Serving from your seat at the table is much faster than running back and forth with two soup bowls at a time. Besides, it is considered to be bad form to scald one's guests.

Don't forget the kids. Sitting still for so many hours, on "best company behavior," no less, is a chore for young children. Try to make them feel part of the evening. One way is to fill their wine glasses with sparkling grape juice.

Food should look good

Soft and fluffy is good. Inevitably, everyone at the seder table feels the compulsion to comment to the host(ess) about the matzoh balls. "Oh, how soft they taste," is the approporiate comment, even if old fillings are being lost in the process. To ensure soft, fluffy matzoh balls, add some fresh seltzer or club soda to your matzoh ball mix just before forming the balls.

Anyone want another shred of turkey? Food should look as good as it tastes. Too often, a beautiful entree is ruined by clumsy carving. A rule of thumb: Before carving, always remove the meat from the roasting pan and let it sit for at least 30 minutes without any gravy or other liquids. This will allow the meat to firm up and produce thin, unbroken slices upon carving.

Cut down on the sodium. Kosher meats are soaked in salt to remove the blood. Remember to soak your meats in running water before you cook them. Many of your older guests are probably watching their blood pressure.

Be inclusive. Jews hail from the four corners of the Earth. Russian Jews have customs different from those from Spain or Syria. When inviting your guests, you might wish to learn what customs they have and allow them to each incorporate one such custom during the seder. Besides making them feel more welcome, it allows a sharing of knowledge for all concerned.

Buy lots of potato starch. Flour is a no-no during Passover. So are many other traditional thickeners and binders. And goodness knows we all eat far too many eggs that week. What to do? Buy lots of potato starch. It will save your gravies, soups, dumplings, etc., when all else fails.

Tasty vegetable dishes

Sometimes it feels like we overload on matzah, meat and eggs.

It is possible to have delicious vegetable dishes. Here are two, adapted from Foodland Ontario recipes.

Germany to charge 25 with war crimes

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Acting on information culled from files of the former East German secret police, German authorities will charge some 25 people with Nazi war crimes, the World Jewish Congress (WJC) said Monday.

The charges will be initiated by the state prosecutor's office in the central German city of Ludwigsburg as the result of research into millions of documents on Nazi war criminals that had been held in the archives of the Stasi, the secret police in the former East Germany.

But because of the age and physical condition of the 25 people to be charged, it is unlikely that all will be brought before a German court, said WJC Executive Director Elan Steinberg.

"We're not likely to see many charges brought before the courts soon," Steinberg said.

In the past, German officials have delayed prosecutions of suspected Nazi war criminals because of their failing health.

The office handling such prosecutions is understaffed and underfinanced by the German government, Steinberg said. He noted that only one person has been assigned the task of combing through the millions of documents in the Stasi archives.

According to the WJC, the documents indicated that 50 to 70 citizens from both sides of the formerly divided Germany had been blackmailed by the Stasi because of war crimes they committed a half-century ago.

Some historians have suggested the archives contained the names of some leading West German government officials and business leaders, and that some of them may have been blackmailed.

Curtain comes down in 'Orthodox' bus

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — A commuter bus catering mainly to Orthodox Jews has agreed to remove a curtain separating men and women passengers as part of a settlement with a woman who refused to give up her seat so male passengers could pray.

The settlement reached last week ended a lawsuit against the Monsey Trails bus company brought by Sima Rabinovicz after a December 1993 incident.

Male passengers had asked Rabinovicz to give up her seat in the women's section so the men could have more room to recite the afternoon prayers.

Rabinovicz, who is not Orthodox, refused. She charged that the bus driver and several passengers harassed her. The men ended up praying in the street.

Rabinovicz sued the bus company on the basis of sex discrimination. The company, which operates the Manhattan-Rockland County route, is chassidic-owned but government subsidized.

Anyone can ride the bus but passengers are almost exclusively chassidic Jews who live in Monsey, N.Y., and the surrounding area.

The settlement reached earlier this month stipulates that the bus company can no longer provide the curtain or anything on which to hang a curtain, like hooks. Passengers will also be allowed to sit wherever they choose.

But passengers will be allowed to provide their own curtains, as long as they do not interfere with other passengers or pose a safety problem.

Ambassador designate champions trade

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — Robbie Sabel, slated to become Israel's next ambassador to Canada, has spent much of the last 18 years negotiating peace with Israel's neighbors.

Now he hopes to strengthen those agreements by promoting investment in the Middle East.

"The key to peace is trade, trade and more trade," says Sabel, due to take up his new post in Ottawa in June, pending Canadian approval of his credentials. Sabel will replace Yitzhak Shelef, who has been ambassador since 1990.

An expert in international law, Sabel, 54, was a member of the Israeli delegations that negotiated the peace treaty with Egypt, the terms of the Sinai Multinational Observer Force in 1981 and the Taba arbitration with Egypt.

More recently, he was a legal advisor and delegate to the Washington peace talks, serving on the Palestinian-Jordanian track from 1992 to 1994. He was not involved in forging the Oslo agreement which, he admits, "came as a surprise."

Sabel is convinced that war is a thing of the past in the Middle East. "We have moved out of the era of military conflict. That change is irreversible," he asserts. "That doesn't mean we're going to see an Israeli ambassador in Damascus next month. But it does mean that no Arab leader now thinks in terms of war ... The whole Arab world has moved towards relations with Israel."

Change is irreversible

Sabel is quick to qualify this. He says Israel's immediate neighbors have ruled out the option of war. Iran and Iraq have not. "They constitute a threat to the existence of Israel," he says.

Robbie Sabel

But Sabel says he is optimistic by nature, and can see an agreement with Syria in the future.

What role could Canadian forces play in maintaining that peace? Strictly an observer role on the Golan Heights, similar to that of the multinational force stationed in Sinai, says Sabel.

"The point of such a force is to act as a trip wire, alerting the world to violations by one side or the other ... The alternative is to have Israeli observers on the Syrian side and Syrian observers on the Israeli side — something both countries are unlikely to agree to."

But Sabel believes Canada can make the greatest contribution towards Middle East peace in the economic realm.

"We have to help develop the economies of the Palestinians and of Jordan and Egypt, in order to transform this region into the prosperous area it once was. The key to this is private investment," says Sabel.

"The free trade agreement between Canada and Israel will be a key element in encouraging private enterprise," he says.

Sabel downplays the importance of Canada's embargo on arms trade with Israel. The policy — now under review — has been sharply criticized by Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

"The embargo should be dropped," says Sabel. "But it is a minor issue. The majority of trade between Canada and Israel will not be in the defence industries."

On the granting of refugee status by Canada to Israeli citizens, Sabel says, "We have no problem with Canada granting Canadian nationality to any Israeli who wants to live there. But I don't think this should be done on the grounds of political refugee status. Israel is an open, vibrant democracy."

Profile of Robbie Sabel

Robbie Sabel was born in Herts, England, and says he was a Zionist from an early age, having made aliyah at 7.

His British-born father came to Israel in 1948 to fight in the War of Independence as a MAHAL foreign volunteer.

"He liked the country so much, he decided to stay and brought us here," says Sabel, whose impeccable English reflects his British roots.

He studied law at the Hebrew University and was the director of the international law division of the Foreign Ministry until 1981. He was a member of the United Nations General Assembly legal committee and has represented Israel on various other international bodies.

As legal adviser to the Foreign Ministry from 1986-1993, he served under four Foreign Ministers: Yitzhak Shamir, Moshe Arens, David Levy and Shimon Peres.

He has spent the last year writing a book on international law to be published by Cambridge University Press.

Sabel describes himself as an avid outdoors enthusiast, who used to like to "drag" his two children on hikes into the Judean desert "to look for fresh water springs and archeological ruins."

However, he and his wife Ruth, a social worker, are not quite as enthusiastic about some of the outdoor activities that Canada has to offer. "My only experience with skiing was in Geneva where I took a beginners' lesson that ended abruptly when I crashed into the ski hut at the bottom of the novice hill," Sabel recalls.

"I am ashamed to admit it, but I have never been to Ottawa," says the ambassador-designate, although he has visited Montreal several times.

"Canada is considered a prime posting in any foreign office," he says. — L.F.

U.S. senators favor Jerusalem embassy

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — A record 93 U.S. senators have urged the Clinton administration to move the United States Embassy in Israel from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem.

In a letter to Secretary of State Warren Christopher last week, the senators called on the U.S. government to move its embassy no later than May 1999, when Israel and the PLO are scheduled to complete their final-status talks.

Resolutions to move the embassy to Jerusalem and recognize a united Jerusalem as the capital of Israel have been discussed before.

But in the wake of the Israeli-PLO self-rule accord signed in September 1993, the issue has sparked concern that an immediate transfer would threaten the peace process.

Circulated by senators Alfonse D'Amato and Daniel Moynihan, last week's letter seeks to head off other members of Congress who are advocating an immediate move.

Moynihan and D'Amato hope to avoid a political confrontation with the PLO.

But Sen. Jon Kyl is considering introducing legislation that would force the State Department to move the embassy to eastern Jerusalem before Oct. 1 of this year.

As for the record number of senators supporting the initiative, Moynihan said, "U.S. senators do not often agree, but 93 agree that an undivided Jerusalem is the capital of the State of Israel."

A similar letter in the House of Representatives, circulated by Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) and Benjamin Gilman (R-N.Y.), has 84 signatures.

The Clinton administration may already agree with the sentiments in the letters. In October, the United States bought a plot of land in western Jerusalem for future "diplomatic use," where a "very senior diplomat" would live, according to the State Department.

Several Jewish groups expressed support for the new Senate initiative, but others are endorsing the bill being considered by Kyl, requiring an immediate transfer of the embassy, though it is not yet clear whether the bill will be introduced.

Capitol Hill aides said support for the letter was so widespread mainly because it defers a move until after the PLO and Israel reach a final agreement.

Burg, Weizman differ on aliyah message

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — An ideological rift over the centrality of aliyah surfaced last week between Israeli President Ezer Weizman and Avraham Burg, acting chair of the Jewish Agency for Israel.

During a daylong visit to several Jewish Agency and World Zionist Organization projects in Jerusalem, Weizman said the sole message to Diaspora Jewry must be "persistent, unequivocal and clear" — aliyah.

Burg, on the other hand, believes the emphasis must be on Jewish education, both in Israel and abroad, with aliyah becoming the voluntary result of that education.

Weizman stressed the need to encourage aliyah by stressing Israel's advancements in high-technology and industry.

Burg argued that Israel's strong army and developed industries are not enough to attract Jews living in prosperous countries.

Without the spiritual element, and without a strong Jewish-Zionist identity, the State of Israel will lose its uniqueness and become "a state of Hebrew-speaking gentiles," Burg said.

"We are approaching today the end of the catastrophic Zionist era, in which Jews escaped for their lives, and found refuge in Israel," he said.

"The central question of our lives must be how to combat assimilation that destroys half of our people. There are no simple answers to this question."

Judith spends an hour getting to know him. She is impressed by his ability to articulate his feelings but is concerned about his depression and lack of motivation. After an hour, Mark agrees to another appointment with Judith.

11:00 a.m.-1:00 p.m.

Judith shares her experience by taking part in an agency planning committee which was struck to create new services for single parent mothers and their children.

1:00 p.m.-3:00 p.m.

Two more client interviews.

The first is with Mrs. W. and her daughter, Susan, 23. Susan has finally agreed to seek help to deal with her cocaine problem. With the support of her mother, she has come to find out about detoxification and drug treatment programs.

Judith reviews several options and makes inquiries as to availability. Mrs. W. and Susan agree to think things over and call Judith with their decision.

The next session is with Mr. and Mrs. L. and their children, ages 12 and 9. Mrs. L. has recently been diagnosed with breast cancer and the family is extremely worried. The children's school performance has deteriorated and the school has requested some support for the children. Further assessment shows a very stressed financial situation and an accumulated debt burden.

Judith focuses on providing information and support to the family as she helps sort out both the practical and the emotional problems. She refers Mr. L. to a professional financial counsellor and Mrs. L. to a self-help group, and she agrees to follow up on the children's progress at school.

Reducing conflict

3:00 p.m.

Judith goes to a Jewish day school to lead a teachers' workshop on managing classroom behavior. Teachers have requested material aimed at reducing conflict in the classroom and improving student-teacher and student-student relationships.

4:30 p.m.

Judith returns to the office, reviews her messages, responds to the urgent ones, scribbles down some case notes, opens her mail and prepares to leave.

Just as she is leaving, she is asked to help a single man of 25, who has nowhere to spend the night and no food to eat. Referrals to an emergency shelter and to Le Mercaz food bank solve the problem until the next morning, when a more complete evaluation will be done.

8:30 p.m.

Judith goes home, exhausted but feeling she has made a difference.

New Islamic group issues threat to Jews

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — An organization which apparently models itself on Algeria's Islamic Salvation Front made its debut in Gaza Saturday with a leaflet threatening "every Jew on the land of Palestine."

Signed by the Islamic Front for the Salvation of Palestine, the leaflet came as Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat committed himself to U.S. Vice-President Al Gore to crack down on "the enemies of peace."

Like its Algerian counterpart, the Gaza group declares war on "the influence of the West found in cinemas, alcohol, gambling and prostitution."

Hamas officials disclaimed any knowledge of the group.

Following his meeting with Gore in Jericho on Friday, Arafat told a joint press conference, "On our side we have taken and will take the means to deal with those who threaten the peace process. Among these measures are the creation of the state security courts."

Gore also alluded to the courts that Arafat established six weeks ago by saying he "welcomed the decision to prosecute terrorists."

Famous novelist publishes new book

After 60 years, Henry Roth sets the story straight

By MARALINE KUBIK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The author of the critically acclaimed novel, Call it Sleep, considered by some to be the greatest work of American Jewish fiction this century, has recently published his third novel.

Although most men his age are retired, Henry Roth, 89, is more interested in resuming the career he abandoned more than 60 years ago, a career he's been trying to reclaim ever since.

Roth published Call It Sleep in 1934 at age 28 then slipped into oblivion, plagued by insurmountable writer's block. Call It Sleep, Roth's fictionalized autobiography, however, retained a prominent position in literary and academic communities despite sluggish sales.

The book traces the path of David Schearl, an 8-year-old Jewish immigrant to New York City at the turn of the century.

In 1964, Call It Sleep was reissued by Penguin in paperback and became an immediate bestseller, focusing a literary spotlight on Roth, then eking out a living as a waterfowl farmer.

Last month, Roth celebrated the publication of Mercy of a Rude Stream, Volume II: A Diving Rock on the Hudson, the second novel in a planned series of six.

Although he'd abandoned his craft, Roth says the urge "to finish the Jewish ghetto kid's story" never left him. "It was there smoldering underneath like the fire that burns underneath the moss in a forest fire," he explains.

Henry Roth

While Roth admits Call It Sleep is interesting, he says it is inaccurate. "Call It Sleep was written by a precocious juvenile," he says disdainfully. "The young man who wrote it was full of lyricism instead of any kind of real reflection of the true conditions of the East Side."

The East Side, Roth explains, was a very friendly, protected, homogeneous community, not the brutal environment depicted in Call It Sleep. After recognizing the novel's inaccuracies, Roth says, he was compelled to set the story straight.

That is precisely what Mercy of a Rude Stream does. Ira Stigman, the protagonist, is a somewhat older and more realistic version of David. Unlike Call It Sleep, which unfolds from a child's perspective, Mercy of a Rude Stream is told in two voices: the aged Ira looking back and the aged writer somewhat regretfully reliving his trials as an artist.

With completion of Mercy of a Rude Stream, Roth says, "I've accomplished what I set out to do and that was to resume my role as a literary man."

That being the case, for what does Roth want to be most remembered? "That's easy," he retorts. "Just a decent guy, a mentsh.

"I spent most of my life trying to become a mentsh. I was very much dissatisfied with the person I had become. I had to become someone I could live with and that I was satisfied with. And that was tied up to starting to write again."

The first volume of Mercy of a Rude Stream: A Star Shines Over Mt. Morris Park was published by St. Martin's Press last January.

Survivor's art created from haunting memories

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Aficionados of the art of the Holocaust won't want to miss a moving exhibit of sculpture by the renowned French artist Georges Jeanclos, a child survivor whose memories haunt him still.

The 22 terracotta pieces and one bronze now on display at the George R. Gardiner Museum of Ceramic Art are drawn from the artist's wartime memories.

As a 7-year-old in Nazi-occupied Vichy France, Jeanclos and his family were hidden by the Resistance in the southern French forests for a year. Although he and his family survived, Jeanclos has transfered his nightmarish fear of being pursued and the horrific discovery of the Holocaust's totality into his work.

The artist's choice of clay as his primary medium is propitious, for, as the accompanying text explains, "clay holds memories of every act upon it." This is an exhibit of memory.

Technique creates dynamic effect

There is a fragility about Jeanclos' work. Often, the clay is paper thin, seemingly ready to crumble. Jeanclos' technique involves literally throwing slabs of clay at an inclined surface, which stretches it and marks it with bits of grit, dust and a personality of its own. The effect is dramatic.

Couple dormeur (Sleeping Couple), is one of the sculptures on display until August 8, 1995.

The exhibit is divided into several sections. Kaddish was Jeanclos' response to his father's death in 1976 and his memorial to the 1.5 million children killed in the Shoah. Expressionless, bald-headed figures are all but hidden under a clay cloak. One has a tefillin on its head. Look carefully and the viewer will see Hebrew passages from Psalms and the Song of Songs incised into the surface, a result of the artist's rediscovery of his Jewish roots and interviews with Holocaust survivors several years earlier.

The Sleepers express the artist's need to escape. Half-hidden beneath tattered covers, the figures have withdrawn from the anguish around them.

The Kamakura series evoke the artist's new-found serenity. Zen-like monks are wrapped in large cloaks whose surfaces, we are told, resemble the perfectly-raked gardens of Kyoto, Japan.

Most other figures are swathed in tattered and shredded garments. Large cracks and crevices allow views inside heads and bodies, a reminder, perhaps, of the artist's painful introspection.

The show's centre-piece is Mary and Joseph, a statement that while the artist lives in a Catholic society, for him, at least, there are no barriers to spirituality.

The display continues to Aug. 8.

Books

By Bernard Baskin

A Historical Atlas Of The Jewish People edited by Eli Barnavi Random House of Canada

This is an elegant volume which contains 200 maps and close to 600 illustrations — all in color. Produced in Israel, it represents the combined efforts of a French publisher and more than 50 internationally renowned scholars. The editor is director of the Department of History of the University of Tel Aviv. It is much more than a book destined for the coffee table.

Each chapter or time segment — beginning with the migration of the biblical patriarchs and concluding with recent events in Israel — is presented as a double-page spread. Featured elements include a text that offers key insights into the specific period; a map (or combination of maps) that places events in a spatial context; a chronological table at the foot of every page that adds significant additional information; and carefully selected, unhackneyed illustrations.

The historical flow is interrupted from time to time by important thematic digressions: the flow of migrations, the art of the manuscript, the idea of monotheism, religious taboos and the legend of the wandering Jew.

What is special or noteworthy about Jewish history? What is the place of this small people in the destiny of humankind? Abba Eban has pointed to four aspects of this history that have supreme meaning.

First, there is the mystery of preservation. How did this people manage to preserve its identity in dispersion and exile, without a territorial base or political institutions?

Second, there is the mystery of accomplishment. Religion, philosophy, law, drama, science, social institutions, moral ideas — these have all been profoundly affected by the Jewish mind through history.

Third, there is the mystery of suffering, a litany of persecution and privation that defies all parallel — a vale of tears and destruction that has miraculously been surmounted.

And finally, there is the mystery of renewal, the ability to take a language, land and people separated by centuries and bring them back together again in a new birth of independent life.

The writing or recording of history is replete with pitfalls. An event, once it has happened, can be made to look inevitable by a smug historian. Nostalgia, it has been said, is a seductive liar. And a cynic has declared that after you have heard two different eyewitness accounts of the same automobile accident, you begin to wonder about the validity of history. Yet, there is no escape from the lessons of the past.

Where controversial issues from the lessons of the past steer a middle course between orthodox and liberal attitudes and beliefs. The compromise will not please everyone.

For instance, in the description of the ancient conquest of Canaan by the Israelites the text reads, "Archeological research has found no traces of any sudden violent destruction of the major Canaanite towns. Jericho, for example, was clearly not destroyed in the times of Joshua. On the other hand, excavations reveal that many small settlements began emerging on the outskirts of the existing Canaanite towns, not in place of them. Dwelling structures and pottery typical of semi-nomadic people indicate a long process of colonization rather than a short war of total conquest."

In discussing the problem of secularism and religion in modern Israel, the text makes clear that despite the importance of religion, there must be a radical separation of religion and state. The present situation is a "source of religious, moral and civil corruption."

The Jewish calendar is the longest-running calendar in the world — a triumphant reaffirmation of both Jewish tenacity and creativity.

CITY TV to air documentary

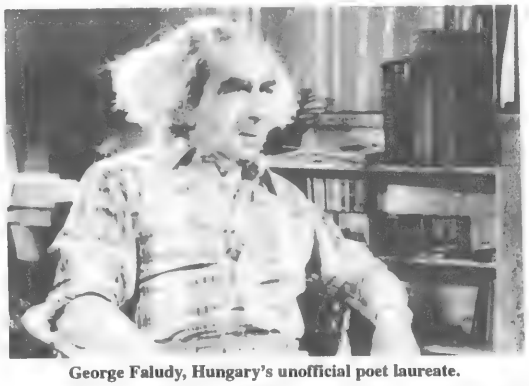
As a poet, George Faludy spent his days 'in hell'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

If you want to be a poet, a Hungarian aphorism goes, you have to go through hell.

And that's exactly the rite of passage George Faludy had to take to become Hungary's greatest living poet.

Faludy, a Jew who lost his sister in the Holocaust, is the subject of David Harel's glowing documentary, My Happy Days in Hell, which will be broadcast on City TV on April 7 at 8 p.m.



George Faludy, Hungary's unofficial poet laureate.

Faludy, who is Hungary's unofficial poet laureate, absorbed tremendous physical and spiritual punishment in pursuit of his art.

Exiled by Hungary's pro-German government in 1938, Faludy settled in Paris, surviving on his mother's food parcels.

One step ahead of the invading German army, Faludy fled to Casablanca, Morocco, which, Harel claims, "fit him like a glove."

Invited to the United States by President Franklin Roosevelt at the behest of 80 American intellectuals, Faludy found refuge in New York City. During World War II, he joined the U.S. armed forces. After the hostilities ended, he returned to Hungary.

A committed Social Democrat, Faludy resisted the advances of the new Communist government. Accused of being a "fascist," a "U.S. agent" and a "rootless cosmopolitan" (a Stalinist buzzword for a Jew), Faludy was imprisoned by the authorities.

Banished to a forced labor camp in Recsk, Faludy was put to work in a quarry. He toiled 16 hours a day, seven days a week, subsisting on a starvation diet. It was a "virtual death sentence," says Harel, a Toronto film-maker who obviously admires Faludy's fortitude.

Despite the conditions, Faludy never stopped composing poetry. By all accounts, he enchanted his fellow prisoners with his mellifluous verse.

In the wake of Josef Stalin's death, Faludy was freed. He immigrated to London via Vienna. Following his beloved wife's untimely death, he went to Toronto, where he was unable to find a job. He then accepted a teaching job at Columbia University in New York.

Returning to Toronto, Faludy continued to write poetry. Harel does not tell us how he earned a living during this period.

Faludy has been living in Budapest for the past few years, acclaimed as a national hero. Earlier this year, he was awarded the Kossuth Prize, Hungary's most prestigious literary award. And his books are in high demand.

Harel tells his story through interviews, archival film footage, poetry readings and staged episodes.

Eye on Arts

Toronto Jewish Film Festival: Coming up quickly is the third annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival, slated for May 4 to 11 at the newly spruced up Bloor Cinema (Bloor at Bathurst in Toronto). This week-long celebration of international Jewish film has received instant acceptance as a community tradition since it began in 1993.

Festival director Debra Plotkin, whose sister is director of San Francisco's long-established Jewish film festival, comes by her Yiddishkeit naturally: her father is a reform rabbi, her mother the director of a Jewish museum in Phoenix, Ariz. Plotkin came to Toronto in 1992 to be founding director of the festival, which brought some 7,500 patrons into the Bloor Street Cinema over a five-day period in the first year alone.

To choose the films for this year, Plotkin, festival producer Helen Zukerman and York University film professor John Stuart Katz screened more than 100 works. As Plotkin told me during last year's festival, "The tie that binds all the films together is that somehow they express the diversity of the Jewish experience."

Zukerman heads the charitable Zukerman Foundation, which provided seed capital to spark the festival's first season. "We chose the Bloor Street venue because we wanted to take the Jews out of North York," she explains. "We wanted the festival to be for everybody, and if it was in North York, we thought it would be viewed by the rest of the city as for Jews only.

Zukerman says "there's no other event that brings together the Jews from all over the city. You look out at the audience and you see Bay Street Jews sitting next to the kids with the rings in their noses, and everybody's watching the same film. I've never been at a Jewish event where there's been such a diversity of Jews sitting there. That's the most pleasing thing to me about the festival."

The festival program should be ready by the first week of April. The opening film is Mina Tannenbaum, a French film about two women who meet regularly on a bench in Montmartre; they laugh, gossip, squabble and survive. The film-maker will be in attendance.

Others films include the documentaries Hidden Children and Yaakov Ben Dov: Father of the Hebrew Film, as well as several Canadian premieres (Meet Me In Miami Beach, Fiddler on the Hoof, Complaints of A Dutiful Daughter). To receive a program phone 416-324-8226, fax 416-324-8668, or write to 33 Prince Arthur Ave., Second Floor, Toronto Ont. M5R 1B2.

Centre of Jewish Art preserves disappearing heritage

World Zionist Press Service

In the Ukrainian shtetl of Zholkiev, the last Jewish resident is unwilling to leave because "someone has to look after the synagogue."

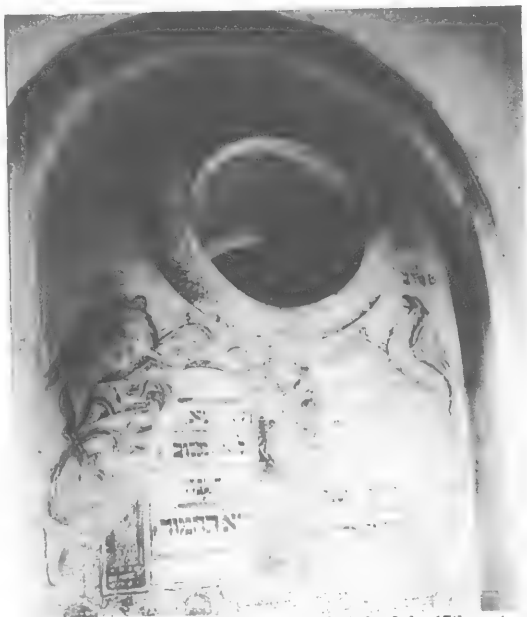
In Grodno, Belarus, a city which before World War II had a Jewish population of 25,000, only five pre-war residents remain to recall the splendor of the 40 synagogues and numerous Jewish community institutions.

In Uzbekistan, Georgia, Azerbaijan and Moldavia, hundreds of years of Jewish history are drawing to a close as whole villages and communities leave for Israel.

The Centre of Jewish Art at Jerusalem' Hebrew University, established by art historian Prof. Bezalel Narkiss, has been preserving Jewish visual heritage for 15 years through the documentation of ritual objects, synagogue architecture, Hebrew illuminated manuscripts and ancient and modern Jewish art.

The only institution of its kind in the world, the centre's work is carried out by history graduate students.

Jewish art in communities at risk of disappearing are top priorities. Since 1990, the centre has gone to Poland, the Czech Republic, Ukraine, Lithuania, Belarus, Russia and Uzbekistan. This summer, expeditions are planned to the Caucasus Mountain region, Moldavia, Ukraine and Poland.



This 19th century painting on the Torah Ark of the 17th century Sandomierz synagogue in Poland was discovered in 1991.

"At present, the political situation is extremely uncertain in the Caucasus region and Moldavia," said Dr. Aliza Cohen-Mushlin, director of the centre and editor of its annual magazine Jewish Art. "There are wars going on and we hope to be able to carry out these expeditions. By next year I am afraid there won't be much left to document."

Information is entered into the Jerusalem Index of Jewish Art, where it is accessible to students, scholars, curators and collectors around the world.

"[It is] a non-invasive form of documentation," Cohen-Mushlin says. "We photograph, draw, describe and measure artifacts. We are not a museum and we do not collect, transfer or remove artifacts. But we do pass on information to others to help preserve what we have found."

On a 1992 expedition to Lithuania, researchers discovered six wooden shtetl synagogues. Cohen-Mushlin said it had been believed that no wooden synagogues survived World War II. The synagogues, in poor condition but never vandalized, are now warehouses and cinemas.

Such finds result from the close cooperation between the centre and the Jewish University in St. Petersburg. University members serve as the centre's eyes and ears and help arrange the expeditions to the former Soviet Union.

The amount of Jewish art remaining in Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union is staggering. In the Jewish Museum in Prague alone, there are at least 32,000 artifacts. The items were gathered by the Nazis from 132 different communities in Bohemia and Moravia, with the intention of creating "a museum of the inferior race," according to Yarona Pinhas, a master's student in art history who researched in Prague.

"We worked in the same offices the Nazis used. The artifacts were meticulously numbered and catalogued. Our aim was to concentrate on the metal ritual objects. We knew we couldn't document the entire collection so we tried to select artifacts which would create a microcosm of ritual items for home and synagogue."

First kosher hotel set to open soon in Budapest

By HARRIET LIEBMANN
Special to The CJN

BUDAPEST — The city's first kosher hotel is set to open this Passover in the heart of Budapest's Jewish district.

The 100-room glatt kosher King's Hotel is housed in an impeccably restored baroque building on Nagydiofa Street.

The hotel is a short walk from the great Dohany Synagogue and the Kazincy Synagogue, the Hungarian Jewish Congress, historic Goldmark Hall, the Jewish Museum, and the rabbinical seminary.

When toured in February, the hotel, owned by Ziggy and Miriam Rosenwasser, was virtually ready to open. Twin state-of-the-art kitchens and twin walk-in freezers sparkled, awaiting the two mashgichim to be brought in from Israel, along with many kosher food products unavailable in Hungary today.

The Thermal Hotel on Margaret Island offers guests kosher meals brought in from the Hanna Restaurant on Wesselenyi street.

The King's Hotel is the first independent kosher hotel in Budapest. Twin dining rooms can accommodate several hundred guests, and a private patio is available for wedding celebrations.

The hotel features western amenities like computerized reception desk, safe deposit boxes, leather sofas and posturepedic beds.

Each room is different. Fifth floor rooms boast skylights and exposed beams. All room have full modern bathrooms (either tub or stall shower), and cable TV with CNN. The twin beds (there are a few double) can be augmented with cots for children. Suites will also be available.

So far, no advertising has been necessary; word has spread through Budapest's kosher butcher and the Jewish grapevine. A block of 50 rooms has been permanently reserved by an Israeli travel agency.

The King's Hotel encourages inquiries by phone or fax at 011-361-267-9324, 5 or 6.

Israel is the biggest smallest country , IGTO rep says

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Staff members of the Israel Government Tourist Office in Toronto traveled across Canada this month to promote Israel to thousands of travel agents from Montreal to Vancouver.

The tour kicked off at Toronto's Park Plaza Hotel, and included stops at the Delta Hotel in Montreal, the Delta Hotel in Winnipeg, the Palliser Hotel in Calgary, the Delta Edmonton Centre and the Hotel Vancouver in Vancouver.

Each event featured a trade show and dinner, followed by talks by director Ruth Ben-Tzur and Eitan Lev, an experienced Israeli tour guide and advisor to Israel's Ministry of Tourism.

Israel, Lev pointed out, "is the biggest smallest country in the world," offering maximum diversity within a small space.

Jerusalem to Tel Aviv on foot?

"People ask me how far is it between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, and I answer, 'Walking or driving?' There are greater distances commuting within the city of Toronto," he said.

Like Ben-Tzur, Lev exhorted his listeners to get to know Israel at least as well as their customers do, and to become aggressive in learning about Israel and marketing it to the Canadian public. "Be daring," he said. "If you see a program that is not quite right for your group, ask the tour operators to accommodate your client."

Lev joked that most tourists in Israel are always tired because their travel agents misinformed them they were going on a "vacation."

"Most group tours get up at 6 a.m. and they're on the bus by 7 a.m.," he noted. "This is a vacation? The Israel army does not work as hard."

Travel Talk

by Bill Gladstone

Algonquin's many campgrounds attract 750,000 people annually.

Algonquin Park, An Appreciation: Immortalized in the canvases of Tom Thomson and other Group of Seven painters, Algonquin Park is one of the most famous wildernesses in Canada. Since it was established in 1893, this vast landscape of primeval forests and crystal lakes, teeming with wildlife, has represented something romantic and spiritual in the national imagination.

Algonquin's many campgrounds, trails and canoe routes have attracted roughly 750,000 visitors annually in recent years. While some penetrate no deeper than the semi-developed corridor surrounding Highway 60, others trek or paddle far into the interior to commune with nature for weeks at a time.

In its early years, before highways and rail links were established, Algonquin was practically inaccessible to all but the most inveterate naturalists. "This vast, solitary, aromatic wilderness is as yet almost as little known as if it were in Labrador or on the Hudson Bay slope," observed Thomas Gibson around 1900.

Not until Joseph Adams' Ten Thousand Miles Through Canada appeared in 1912 did the trip to Algonquin Park become fashionable. Subsequently, several lodges were built. These rustic outposts survived until the 1950s, as did the tradition of dressing in formal attire for dinner in the middle of the wilderness.

The automobile boom of the 1920s, and the completion of Highway 60 in the 1930s, really put Algonquin on the map. Along this ribbon of asphalt lie eight campgrounds, various lodges, trails, picnic areas, the logging museum and a visitor centre. Chances are good of encountering wildlife, even along this built-up section. Motorists are warned to beware of moose along the highway, especially in May and June.

Several decades ago, wildlife biologists at Algonquin discovered that wolves howl in response to imitative howls from humans. In recent years, Algonquin's wolf-howling program, held once a week at dusk, has become a popular summer ritual. Other important research has made Algonquin a pre-eminent spot for wildlife studies.

Five major rivers flow from Algonquin's Precambrian landscape of rocky ridges, mixed forests and tufted undergrowth. The terrain is a consequence of recent glaciation over ancient bedrock.

Perhaps the park's most breathtaking geological vista is the 100-metre deep Barron Canyon on the east side. Another interesting geological feature is the Brent Crater, a giant basin believed to have been formed by the impact of a meteorite some 450 million years ago.

Ironically, Algonquin has come to symbolize the essence of the Canadian outdoors, even though only a few stands of original growth forest remain within its bounds. Today, logging is carried out inconspicuously within Algonquin, away from natural shorelines and most visitors, and under the watchful eye of the Ministry of Natural Resources.

Logged relentlessly from the 1830s onward, the park was established after a strong public outcry in the 1880s. People were fearful that if they didn't act quickly, there would be no forest or wildlife left. In spirit, the conservationist movement that led to Algonquin's preservation is similar to the fervor that arose across Canada when the Spanish trawler was caught earlier this month overfishing along Newfoundland's Grand Banks.

BUY A GREAT SUIT, AND STILL HAVE MONEY LEFT OVER TO PUT IN THE PANTS.

We've always said, "when it comes to selection, style and prices that make sense" there's only one store: GRANT MACKENZIES.

That's all changed. Now there are two stores.

Two Grant Mackenzies.

Thanks to thousands of men who refuse to be taken for a ride by overpriced menswear "salons", we've been able to open a second Grant Mackenzies location.

Come and see our brand new store at 2526 Yonge Street, north of Eglinton on the west side; a little south of Sporting Life.

If you've shopped at Grant Mackenzies before, you know value when you wear it! A tremendous selection of top notch suits in a multitude of sizes in today's top styles, fabulous fabrics, all from the world's finest makers (we deal direct) at amazing prices. Accessories and sportswear too!

The gift certificate attached (use it at either store) represents savings on top of our normal Grant Mackenzies value.

With GRANT MACKENZIES' everyday value and this certificate, you can walk out with a great-looking suit and keep the shirt on your back.

See you soon, and thanks again for your business.
Chag Sameach.

Ottawa fails to name suspect

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Ministry of Citizenship and Immigration last week missed a self-imposed deadline when it failed to name a second person facing loss of citizenship for his wartime activities.

Immigration spokesperson Roger White confirmed the ministry did not file the legal document setting out the case for denaturalization, as it said it would.

"I'm not sure what the delay is," he said.

White said the ministry would "possibly" file two names sometime this week.

Jewish community representatives said they were not surprised at the missed deadline, given the government's many delays in bringing war criminals to justice.

Civilian executions

Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, drew an ominous conclusion from the failure to name names. "It is reminiscent of the (U.S.) Office of Special Investigations where individuals said, 'Don't drag my name through the courts, I'll leave,'" he said.

Littman offered another possible explanation, speculating that law enforcement authorities may be unable to locate the individual.

White declined to comment on Littman's speculations.

Canadian Jewish Congress president Irving Abella said missing the deadline reflects "the type of lethargy that has symbolized the department and the government for the past 50 years." He said there continues to be "a reluctance, indolence and a lack of fire in the belly to get the job done."

Earlier, Immigration authorities revealed that Erichs Tobiass, 84, who faces loss of citizenship

Berger appointment unconfirmed

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Foreign Affairs refused to confirm, but did not deny, a report by CBC Prime Time News last Thursday that David Berger was about to be named the next ambassador to Israel.

But it did produce so many refusals to speculate that press reports last weekend said the government may have floated Berger's name as a trial balloon to gauge reaction before deciding to name him.

"It's mere speculation," Rodney Moore of the department's Middle East media desk, told The CJN, adding there would be no announcement "today or in the foreseeable future."

A spokesperson from the Prime Minister's Office (PMO) said the office "does not comment on speculation."

Berger, who was a Liberal MP for 15 years and is now an advisor on small business financing in the PMO, was not taking media calls late last week.

But he also reportedly called the CBC report speculation.

Rumors that Berger might be named the next ambassador to Israel have been circulating since last December, when he gave up his seat in the riding of St. Henri-Westmount to make room for Lucienne Robillard, a strong francophone federalist, in a byelection.

Norman Spector, the current Canadian ambassador to Israel, was appointed by former prime minister Brian Mulroney.

EARLY DEADLINES

As a result of the upcoming statutory and Passover holidays the offices of The CJN will be closed Apr. 14 and 21.

The deadline for organization and classified ads for the Apr. 20 and 27 issues will be Tuesday, April 11 and 18 at noon respectively.

For retail display ads, the respective deadlines will be Wed. Apr. 12 and 19 at noon.

Scheininger nominated

TORONTO — Former Canadian Jewish Congress national president Les Scheininger has won the Liberal nomination in the Ontario provincial riding of Willowdale.

In voting last Sunday, Scheininger defeated the only other candidate, Gino Matrundola, the riding's Liberal MPP from 1987 to 1990.

The seat is currently held by Tory Charles Harnick, also a well-known figure in the Jewish community.

Scheininger, 47, defeated Matrundola by nearly a 3-1 margin.

He was Congress president from 1989 to 1992 as well as a former chair of Congress Ontario region.

Harnick is the only Jewish member on the Conservative benches.

The race for the Liberal nod in Willowdale got off to an ugly start. Last year, the home of then-candidate Howard Shore was defaced with swastikas and messages telling him to quit the race.

Shore later dropped out to support Scheininger.

Ontario Premier Bob Rae has told MPPs to be ready for a snap election call at any moment.

CJC Expresses Concern

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress has expressed concern and disappointment in the wake of news that the Canadian Human Rights Commission has decided to close or downsize six regional offices across Canada.

CJC national president Irving Abella said his organization has worked closely with the commission, especially in the area of telephone hate lines, and said he hoped that reducing the commission's regional operations would not hinder its work on a national scale.

Summer sessions run from July 4 to 24 and from July 26 to August 17. Hebrew and Arabic language courses run from July 4 to August 17.

Lowy becomes Concordia's first Jewish rector and only its third rector and vice-chancellor since the university was formed in 1974.

His term begins August 15.

Lowy is currently director of the University of Toronto's Centre for Bioethics and a former dean of U of T's faculty of medicine.

ISRAEL

Israelis Killed in Clash

JERUSALEM — An Israeli soldier, a police officer and a Palestinian truck driver were killed in a collision and shooting incident last Wednesday in the Gaza Strip, Israeli and Palestinian officials said.

Two other Israel Defence Force (IDF) soldiers were seriously wounded.

According to the Israelis, an IDF officer and a police officer were killed when a Palestinian truck driver veered into an Israeli army jeep.

Witnesses said the driver jumped out of the truck and began shooting. Israeli soldiers returned fire, killing the driver, Israeli officials said.

A spokesman for PLO leader Yasser Arafat said the collision was an accident and that the Israelis planted a weapon next to the dead driver.

Hunger Strike Ends

JERUSALEM — About 50 hunger strikers who were protesting Israel's peace talks with the PLO decided last week to end their six-week-old vigil, following appeals from leading rabbis and politicians.

The strikers vowed, however, to continue aggressive protest against the government.

Who Can Run?

JERUSALEM — Only Palestinians who recognize Israel's right to exist can run in self-rule elections, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres reportedly told the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee last week.

Peres also reportedly said that all Palestinian candidates must oppose violence as well.

Observers say those conditions throw into doubt whether Hamas-affiliated candidates will be allowed to run in the elections.

Palestinian Map

JERUSALEM — Tel Aviv, Haifa and other Israeli cities are classified as "Jewish settlements" on a map put out last week by the East Jerusalem Arab Studies Institute.

The map of "Palestine" describes all Jewish cities inside the Green Line as "Jewish settlements."

Jerusalem is listed as the "capital of Palestine," and is represented only as the Old City.

The Council of Jewish Communities in Judea, Samaria, and Gaza brought the map to the public's attention.

Rabin in Germany

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin flew unexpectedly to Germany last week, prompting speculation that there were new developments in the case of missing Israeli airman Ron Arad.

But officials at the Prime Minister's Office denied the speculation, saying Rabin flew to Germany for talks with Chancellor Helmut Kohl about the peace process and about Israel's ties with the European Union.

Soccer Match Tied

TEL AVIV — Israel and France played to a scoreless draw in their European Championship Group 1 qualifying soccer match last Wednesday night in Ramat Gan.

Israel remains unbeaten after victories over Poland and Azerbaijan and draws with Slovakia and Romania.

Clocks Forward

JERUSALEM — Daylight saving time began in Israel last Thursday, when clocks were moved forward one hour. Daylight saving time is to last until Sept. 3.

Bribes to Paraguay?

JERUSALEM — Hezbollah is bribing Paraguayan officials, in a bid to win the freedom of seven suspects being held in connection with the 1992 attack on the Israeli embassy in Buenos Aires and the 1994 blast at the Argentinian Jewish community centre, Latin American-based intelligence sources allege in the latest issue of U.S. News and World Report.

The magazine says Argentina is seeking the immediate extradition of the seven — six Arab men and a Brazilian woman — arrested in the Paraguayan capital of Asuncion in January.

WORLD

Parole for Pollard?

NEW YORK — The powerful U.S.-based National Jewish Community Relations Advisory Council (NJCRAC) last week called on the U.S. Parole Commission to parole convicted spy for Israel Jonathan Pollard.

Pollard, now serving a life sentence, will be eligible for parole in November. His hearing is scheduled for May.

UIA urged to find new ways to raise funds

'If you don't change, you won't survive'

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — United Israel Appeal of Canada (UIA) campaigners will have to seek fresh ways to push for dollars in an era when Israel is no longer viewed as under siege and campaigns have stayed "flat."

Delegates were told this at UIA-Canada's 's first national campaign leadership conference that included a parallel young leadership component.

"The message was that if you don't change, you won't survive — unless you revitalize yourself and start to approach it [campaigning] as a business," Eli Rubenstein, UIA Canada's director for young leadership development, told The CJN.

The era of handing out plaques and doing things the old way has to change, was the message invoked by U.S. marketing expert Laurence Smith at the Ritz-Carlton Hotel.

He held a packed, day-long marketing workshop called Developing and sustaining Thriving Campaigns in Light of Hard Truths and New Realities.

"This year, we are coming to grips with the need for change," UIA Canada executive vice-president Steve Ain told the delegates.

"It is hard to change. We do a lot of things very well."

But advancing the work of the UIA will mean "chipping away at what doesn't belong," he said.

One thing Ain said definitely did belong at the conference was the first-time participation of UIA's young leadership.

They comprised about 150 of the 220 total delegates — 50 each from Montreal and Toronto and the rest from Winnipeg, Vancouver, Edmonton, Calgary, Ottawa, Halifax and Saskatoon.

Their participation in a parallel conference was seen as "historic" and they were widely praised by UIA leaders.

"This is the way such conferences should go," UIA president Dr. Gerald Halbert of Toronto told them at the conference's closing session.

Rubenstein said young leadership input was so successful that they will almost certainly be a regular part of future UIA conferences.

During the conference, young leaders (YL) passed a package of resolutions calling on Canadian federations to give their initiatives top priority and to make a YL conference a biannual event.

Young leaders also resolved to set up an official body to deal with its concerns; to participate in international, national and local YL missions set for 1995 through 1997; and to keep communications on-going with their counterparts across Canada.

Greg Masel, an organizer of the international Yachdav young leadership mission to Israel this summer, expected about 80 Canadian participants out of the world total of 500.

Renee Lieberman, the YL conference chair for Montreal who spent several years in New York, told her peers that she only began to appreciate Montreal and its Jewish community after getting involved with the local Combined Jewish Appeal campaign.

The other YL conference chairs were Marion Levin of Toronto and Lorne and Raichell Paperny of Calgary.

Film prompts call for prosecution of Zundel

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Canadian Jewish Congress official publicly challenged Ontario Attorney General Marion Boyd to charge Ernst Zundel under anti-hate laws following the television screening of a documentary on neo Nazis.

"We've provided her lots of evidence, it's shameful that the NDP government didn't go after hatemongers," Congress community relations director Bernie Farber said during a March 29 TVO phone-in following the film Profession: Neonazi.

"The fire in the belly [of the government] is lacking," he said.

The documentary Profession: Neonazi includes a long interview with Zundel in his Toronto bunker, details his importance in the international neo Nazi movement and follows his disciple, Ewald Althans, a young German, to Auschwitz and to meetings with his adherents in Germany.

During the phone-in, film director Winfried Bonegel said Althans is now in jail in Germany for making racist comments and faces another charge arising from his words in Profession: Neonazi.

Of the 15 callers in the hour-long show, only one, a man from Ottawa, took offence at Farber's remarks. "Are you trying to destroy them [the Nazis] because they destroyed you?" he asked.

Most callers agreed the film, which some have said only provides a platform for hatemongers, should be shown. A few were concerned about racist attitudes in their own communities. "I thought it would be peaceful in my rural area but there is creeping anti-immigrant and anti-French hate being expressed," said one.

Bonegel told TVO host Mary Hynes he walked away when Althans argued with a Jewish visitor to Auschwitz. "I stopped everything," he said. "I didn't want to finish. The crew convinced me to carry on. I never thought a human being could do what he did at Auschwitz. I was so shocked and I'm difficult to shock."

Farber said he is not against showing the film if it is put in context, as it was on the TVO program. Warren Kinsella, author of Web of Hate was also a panelist.

The film, presented at the International Festival of Films in Toronto, was reviewed in the Sept. 14, 1994 CJN by Sheldon Kirshner.

Bloor JCC campaigners solicit $600,000 in pledges

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The official campaign kickoff is still some weeks away, but fundraisers at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre have already solicited more than $600,000 in pledges towards the centre's $5-million goal.

About 20 to 25 individuals and several Jewish organizations have pledged the money, said centre director Bill Emery. Fundraisers are still hoping to strike gold with a "big giver" who would pledge $2 million and have the centre, located at the southwest corner of Bloor and Spadina, named for him.

The centre's campaign, set to kickoff sometime in April, came after the Jewish Community Centre (JCC) was restructured into three distinct corporate entities.

As part of the plan, the Bank of Montreal will place a $3-million mortgage on the centre, its share of the JCC's $10-million bank debt.

The Bloor centre is hoping to raise an additional $1 million for capital improvements and $1 million for a capital fund.

Federation will contribute $250,000 per year for three years towards mortgage interest payments.

Operating surplus

Emery said the centre is expected to generate an operating surplus of about $100,000 for the year ending in August.

Bloor membership has stabilized at 3,500, its pre-1994 level, by attracting new and returning members with a special family and children membership that included free programming.

Meanwhile, plans have already been drawn up for renovation and upgrade of the facility. Emery said A new front desk is being built to provide better security and to free up the former front desk area for use as a meeting room.

Later projects will include an aerobics studio for 70, a new restaurant with lobby access, a glass atrium at the south end of the gymnasium for exerise equipment, roof repairs, and sanding and finishing the gym's long-neglected wood floor.

Emery said work on the aerobics studio should begin sometime in 1996.

UNITED JEWISH APPEAL
COMMUNITY MARCH FOR ISRAEL
UPDATE

In Toronto, spring means getting reacquainted with hibernating neighbours, more sunshine and the disappearance of snow. At United Jewish Appeal, spring means March madness, as preparations speed up for UJA's most popular annual event - the Community March for Israel, May 28, Yom Yerushalayim.

This week and next, the March volunteer team will be visiting school children and distributing kits with collection envelopes. And it's not just Jewish day schools that will be hosting March ambassadors. "We've written letters to several public schools seeking permission to talk to students and we've already received O.K'S from several high schools," says Jeff Cohen, who, along with Maura Cooperberg, is co-chairing the five kilometre trek. UJA reps will be telling kids just how much the March means for boys and girls their age in Israel. Proceeds will be directed to programs for children and teenagers who have recently made aliyah.

Community March T-shirts have always been hotly sought items, and this year, like last, they're easy to win. Collect $60. Submit the funds by May 1, and the T-shirt is yours.

Although it's a 9 hour drive from Israel's northernmost city of Metulla to Eilat in the deep south, Toronto marchers will be able to cover the distance on foot in just over an hour. From Metulla to Eilat is this year's theme, with the Promenade Shopping Centre starting point representing Metulla and the Bathurst Jewish Centre finish line symbolizing Eilat.

Eilat is Israel's international resort with a year- round festival atmosphere, so it's no wonder UJA is planning the biggest festival yet to follow a Community March. "Bigger and better," is how co-chair Cooperberg describes it. "We're catering to everyone from little children to adult children and teenagers in-between." We'll keep you posted on this year's range of activities.

Here's a final thought for this, the first of several Community March updates. The March is a moving tribute to Jewish unity. You can help by calling the Community March Hotline at (416) 631-5734.

New ways to fund Jewish schools urged

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Organized Jewish communities must find a new way of funding day schools because the cost is prohibitive for many Jewish families, a leading scholar in Jewish education has charged.

"There's no question that it's too expensive to be a Jew," said Prof. Walter Ackerman of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev. "If you're sending more than one child to day school and camp you have to earn a lot of money to do that."

Ackerman was the scholar-in-residence for Leonard Wolinsky Lectures sponsored by York University's Centre for Jewish Education.

Ackerman said Jewish day education is seen as the most effective way of countering assimilation, which is why it has to be accessible to all Jews.

He said a greater percentage of Jewish children are enroled in Jewish elementary schools than in the '50s, but lower middle class families may have difficulties coming up with tuition fees.

Culture of consensus

Ackerman also spoke about the role of Federation, the communal arm of North American Jewry, in Jewish education in another lecture.

After 1988, he said, Federation became involved not only in funding but in the day-to-day operations of Jewish schools, with employees heading boards or bureaus of education.

"Not everybody thinks that's an unkind blessing because Federation is a culture of consensus and schools are entirely different," he said.

He said there has been a realignment of education priorities in light of the need to ensure continuity.

With congregational supplementary schools viewed as failures, there is more value placed on Jewish education beyond the classroom — camps, retreats and trips to Israel, he said. However, Jewish communal agencies need to define the goals of these programs, he said.

He said the correlation between trips to Israel and a declining intermarriage rate will be difficult to prove. "In 15 to 20 years from now the only thing we will be able to say is that a lot of money was spent."

Israel pavilion to return in 1996

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prarie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — While Folklorama will be without an Israel pavilion for the first time this summer, signs bode well for the return of Shalom Square in 1996.

The Jewish community has sponsored a pavilion since the start of the popular summer folk arts festival 26 years ago. However, a lack of volunteers made it impossible to mount Shalom Square for this year (CJN, Feb. 16).

Now organizers are reporting a renewed surge of interest within the Jewish community.

"It is too late for this year, but we received a lot of calls, including from Palm Springs, offering to co-chair the pavilion," said Donald Aronovitch, president of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council.

"We have scheduled a meeting for after Pesach to plan for 1996."

Longtime pavilion co-chair Sharon Bronstone said she is encouraged by the calls. "Maybe one or two people will now step forward and take this on," she said.

Bronstone and last year's co-chair Stuart Greenfield are planning to help at Folklorama this year, in other capacities.

Online venom

Hate messages virtually untraceable

The bigots and hatemongers have discovered the information highway. Electronic super-hatred is the latest rage in Europe and North America.

Forget books and magazines. Too costly, too cumbersome, and too easy to get caught. With a modem and a keyboard, anyone can transmit hatred and bigotry to a potential audience of millions around the globe.

The Internet, the largest worldwide network, has become the distribution medium of choice for purveyors of hate literature.

Because Internet messages are not routed through a single location, but rather through a web of interconnected computer terminals, they are virtually untraceable.

The hatemongers can dump their venom, thousands of words at a time, entire books if they want, complete with pictures, into the network at several million entry points in universities, research institutes, businesses and private homes around the world.

More than 20 million people a day use the Internet. Messages cannot be erased.

One man in British Columbia, Ken McVay, has made it his life's work to try to answer anti-Semitic literature on the Internet.

A German television network, Suedwestfunk, reported last year that German neo-Nazis, prohibited by a new law from selling Holocaust denial books, simply put their material into the Internet and used computer networks to advertise rallies and swap racist computer games.

In Britain, the Institute of Jewish Affairs issued a 270-page report entitled Anti-Semitism World Report 1994, which said computer bulletin boards, accessible through the Internet, had enabled neo-Nazis to establish an international distribution network "more or less inaccessible to law enforcement agencies."

It noted computers are being used for electronic anti-Semitism in Europe and North America, Holocaust denial in Canada and Austria, neo-Nazi organizing in France and Germany and white power in Sweden.

Bulletin boards such as alt. skinheads offer white supremacy and racism. Alt. revisionism features Holocaust denial discussions.

An American racist signed on as Jewkill and entered the network through Norway to interrupt Jewish oriented discussions by flooding screens with his message: "Hitler was right, Jews are parasites."

There is nothing subtle about the material. HOLOHOAX.TXT features Holocaust denial material. HOMOBASH describes a gay person being shot in the face. Another bulletin board features a Jew with a prominent nose holding a knife standing in a sea of gentile blood.

The Simon Wiesenthal Centre in Los Angeles filed a report last year with the Federal Communications Commission (FCC). The FCC decided it didn't have jurisdiction over the Internet, which it viewed as a telephone system rather than a broadcasting system, so it turned the file over to the U.S. Justice Department which has not so far done much more.

At the National Plenary in May, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) is holding a panel on the subject, entitled Hate in the Age of Cyberspace.

CJC national director Bernie M. Farber, and Calgary lawyer Hal Joffe, chair of community relations, wrote an article in The Globe and Mail last month entitled Something wicked comes this way and it's on the Internet.

Solicitor-General Herb Gray says, "It's an emerging problem. We're trying to get a handle on it before it becomes a serious problem."

An interdepartmental committee of officials from the departments of Foreign Affairs, Justice and the Solicitor-General has been set up to study the international situation.

"Obviously, for international agreements to work, all the relevant people have to sign on," Gray says. "Because of the nature of the new technology it's not easy.

"We as a country have said that the spread of hate literature is contrary to Canadian values and therefore open to prosecution in the same way we prosecute for hate literature sent through the mails, or appearing on radio, television, or in publications.

"The same principle should apply to the spread of hate material via the Internet into our country," says Gray.

Gray had better hurry. Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel announced last month that he plans to enter the Internet with his publications later this year — from the safety of an entry point in the United States.

'Michael is with a family at the moment'

There's a strong probability that Michael Benjamin is with a family when another one calls.

Families tell us again and again that our time spent meeting with them is more comforting than sympathy.

For instance, only at Benjamin's is there the opportunity of discussion with licensed funeral directors who are Jewish.

There is a depth of Jewish knowledge to draw upon, and the assurance of personal supervision that leaves no doubt about strict religious observance.

They receive sensitive advice respecting unique family circumstances when they ask about alternatives and express their preferences. They know with confidence that Kovod and dignity will always prevail.

Families recognize that more than a license is needed when there is just one chance to honour the memory of a loved one without incident and according to Jewish custom. For them, the difference at Benjamin's is worth everything.

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer Fred M. Catzman has been researching their origins over the past few years. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

CYMBERKNOPF

An unusual surname of my correspondent from Willowdale is Cymberknopf pronounced Tzimberknop.

I am unable to track down this name, although it does appear to have a Yiddish flavor — Tzimbering is Jewish for cinnamon.

There is a resemblance — admittedly remote — to Cembrowanic, the Slavic word for furniture dealer.

An open letter to G-d

Dear G-d,

In a short while, we will be celebrating the holiday of Passover. We will gather at the Seder table to commemorate our glorious redemption from Egypt.

Tradition teaches us that this month is auspicious for the final and complete redemption.

For over 1900 years, ever since the destruction of the Second Temple, we have turned to you and prayed לשנה הבא בירושלים, Next Year in Jerusalem.

During our long stay in exile we have been persecuted, tortured, murdered and expelled from one country after another. In spite of all our suffering, we have never lost our faith in your promise to redeem us, and mankind, through the coming of Mashiach.

The "birthpangs" which were prophesied to occur before the final redemption were the most horrifying imaginable. Yet we managed to rebuild ourselves from the Holocaust with the firm belief that we would merit to see a world of no war, no sickness no hunger and no pain.

Now 50 years have passed. Many Messianic prophecies have been fulfilled, i.e. the fall of Communism, the ingathering of Russian Jews into Israel, and the Gulf War.

In 1991 the Lubavitcher Rebbe, whose 93rd birthday is on the 11th day of Nissan, declared that: "The time of the redemption has arrived. Mashiach is about to appear and we must greet him by increasing our commitment to Torah and Mitzvot, adding acts of Goodness and Kindness and learning about the Redemption."

We have been trying to do our part and we will continue to do more.

But, Dear G-d, we beg you, as a child begs a parent, we have had enough of this exile עד מתי — How long must we wait?!

We implore and we demand that you do your part. Allow all your children to join together and finally declare:

ברוך הבא מלך המשיח!

Welcome King Mashiach!

Skepticism that tarnishes

Steven Spielberg is attempting to record on video tape the personal stories and wartime memories of as many as possible of Hitler's remaining survivors. This effort is called the Holocaust documentation project. On March 31 a columnist in the Globe and Mail questioned the project's worthiness. The writer concluded with a question, as provocative as it was rhetorical, "What's accomplished by documenting any of this?"

He also speculated on the motives of the survivors for wanting their stories to be recorded. "I know people say we have to preserve the past so as not to repeat it, but I'm skeptical ... I think the motives lie more in a deep human need for recognition and the fear of obscurity."

Unfortunately for the Globe's columnist, the survivors have been very explicit about their reasons for telling their stories to the cameras. And understandably, they have expressed a number of reasons. The four most common, not surprisingly, are the ones which are the easiest to understand.

Some, burdened still by sorrow and even by shame, have been unable all these years to tell their children of their suffering, of the horrors they lived through, of the people they have mourned every day of their lives since then. The video camera may enable them to do this. Some are simply looking for a way to lift the stone from their heart. The interview, they hope, may possibly help. Some are appalled and frightened by the increasing attempts and rabid persistence of a new generation of haters to deny the truth of their experiences. Putting their individual stories into a permanent library before time runs out is, they feel, the most effective and poignant method of fighting these haters. And, yes, some do want, simply, to help ensure that nothing like the Holocaust ever happens again, to anyone, anywhere on earth. Participating in the Holocaust documentation project, for the record, therefore, is one of the ways they are trying to help.

Why tarnish so worthy and solemn an enterprise? Why diminish the motives of the survivors? Why make an already difficult and, for some, agonizing task even more so? Why engage in a psychobiographical speculation which reflects nothing but the state of mind of the speculator. Why not accept at face value what the survivors themselves have said? Don't we owe them at least that amount of respect?

Terror's time warp

"The Islamic Resistance launched rocket attacks on the Zionist settlements of Safad, Nahariyah and Kiryat Shmona in the north of occupied Palestine." With these hate-filled words, in language reminiscent of the old-style propaganda and the self-deluding slogans of a bygone era, Hezbollah claimed responsibility for the killing of an IDF soldier last Friday.

The Islamic extremists cannot see their way into the new reality of the Middle East. As if caught in a warp of time, twisted and distorted by the uncompromising fury of their own religious intolerance, they will not step into these changing times.

It was no coincidence that the military exchanges occurred during the visit to the area by Russian Foreign Minister Andrei Kozyrev who was rumored in Israeli media to be carrying a message from Syrian President Hafez al-Assad to Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin. Indeed, the top story in the Yediot Aharanot last Friday asserted that the Syrian president had already promised to let Israel open a low-level diplomatic office in Damascus, even before completion of a withdrawal from the Golan Heights. In the capitals of the region and in Washington, there was a sense that palpable progress had been achieved during the week, in the discussions between Israel and Syria.

By its rocket bombardment of Israel, however, Hezbollah was serving notice, even for the Syrians who have always been regarded as their patrons and sponsors, that they still intend to be a deadly factor in any ultimate political settlement.

Budget blues for professionals

In a recent issue of The CJN, an accountant gave a brief overview of Paul Martin's budget. I believe he missed the most crucial part of that budget for all self-employed professionals (doctors, dentists, lawyers, accountants etc.) with deferred tax year ends. Martin's proposal to force all taxpayers into a calendar year end will have unfair, disastrous, and perhaps unintended tax consequences for all the above groups.

The unfairness lies in two areas. In the transition to the calendar year end, professional net income in the stub year, in effect, becomes taxable income, due to the loss of all deductions such as RRSP, personal exemptions etc. This alone would raise taxes inequitably. Secondly, the entire net professional income in the sub year 1995 is taxed at the highest marginal tax rate. This is unconscionable. It would result in self-employed professiolnals paying tens of thousands of dollars above and beyond the normal tax payable (again, because the entire 1995 calendar year income is taxed at the highest marginal rate and it cannot be reduced by RRSP contributions).

I urge all these individuals to contact their tax advisors urgently to verify this. I then urge them all to contact their MP and Paul Martin to encourage them to revise these drastic and decidedly unfair tax increases.

Searching for relatives in Canada

I am a recent immigrant from the Soviet Union, and am trying to locate my father's relatives, who immigrated to Toronto many years ago, or their children or grandchildren.

My grandfather's brother, Simon Mesonzhnik, emigrated from Fastov, near Kiev, Ukraine, in about 1914. Their mother and two sisters joined Simon in Toronto in the late 1920s; their father had died several years earlier in one of the pogroms that swept the Ukraine in that period. I believe that Simon was in the shirt business in Toronto.

My grandfather was an actor in Tiraspol under the stage name Mikhail Mon. He received a Canadian visa and was to join the family in Toronto in the late 1930s. He left through Germany, was deported back to the Soviet Union by the Nazis, then was arrested by the KGB and jailed in Siberia, where he died in 1952.

My father, Yakov Feinstein (Mikhail's son), lived with his mother in Smolensk and took her last name. He remembers receiving letters from the family in Toronto before World War II. However, contact was lost during the Stalin era, when communication with the West was severely restricted.

What a man this Sokol is!

Re: the article on San Francisco 49er Harris Barton, believed to be the only Jewish player in the National Football League (CJN, Feb. 16).

Perhaps the most phenomenal Jewish athlete today is Steve Sokol, 38, of San Jose, Calif., who has been dubbed "the world's fittest man." He went to Hebrew school in Yonkers, N.Y., and is a proud Jew. When I recently spoke to him, I was surprised that, although various American newspapers and magazines have written articles on him, not one Jewish publication has profiled him.

In 1981, Sokol executed 52,003 sit-ups in 32 hours and 17 minutes. In 1983, he performed 30,000 jumping jacks in 7½ hours. In 1985, he rode a bicycle from San Francisco to Los Angeles, a distance of 500 miles on the hilly coastal highway, in 43 hours. And in 1994, within a 24-hour period, Sokol swam two miles, race-walked five miles, kayaked five miles, did five miles on a rowing machine, skied 10 miles on a machine, ran 10 miles, hiked 10 miles in the mountains, biked 100 miles, completed 1,000 sit-ups, 1,000 push-ups, 1,000 leg lifts and 1,000 jumping jacks, and lifted 50,000 lbs. That is incredible!

Megillah in Saint John Museum

In the March 16 issue there was a very fine article by Dr. Fred Weinberg about an old Megillah and an inlaid box that was made by a prisoner at Dorchester Penitentiary. These articles were identified as being from the collection of Dr. Weinberg, but in reality they are in the collection of the Saint John Jewish Historical Museum (the only Jewish Museum in the Atlantic Provinces) and was given to us by Leonard Kaplansky of Montreal, the grandson of A. Kaplansky, the original owner.

Proud to be Jewish

I was glad to see in March 9 Montreal edition that the elderly people of the Sephardi community are speaking up about Quebec separation. This is a problem that is affecting many members of the Jewish community and I am proud to see what our golden agers are saying about it. I feel like they do: they do not want Quebec to separate.

The Jewish community wants Canada to stay unified. When I see the community stand together and fight for something of importance, it makes me proud to be Jewish.

THE JEWS OF CANADA

Alberta & the Yukon

By LEVI BEIERBACH
Special to The CJN

Cowboys, fur traders and rum-runners tamed Canada's Wild West, and many of them were Jews.

Whether wearing the leathery duds of cowpokes and trappers or the rustic overalls of farm hands, the children of Abraham plowed an indelible furrow in Alberta's history.

Their trickle to Alberta began in the 1860s when Jewish liquor merchants and trappers arrived seeking an easier life than that in the European shtetlach.

"Almost all who came here sought better lives and greater opportunities than could be found in the old country," explains Jack Switzer of the Jewish Historical Society of Southern Alberta.

"Many saw emigration as an escape route from intolerable social conditions, persecution and even organized massacres."

As access to Alberta became easier due to the national railroad, more Jews started settling in the province, mainly in the farming communities at Trochu, Rumsel and Sibbald.

And by the turn of the century 242 settlers, mostly from Russia, Poland and Romania, were braving the dry prairie summers and the biting winters. But because of their inexperience at farming and a lack of financial aid, a good portion left for the United States.

"After too many years of drought, the settlers from Sibbald moved to Los Angeles and became chicken farmers," says Jay Joffe, president of the historical society

As communities in the larger centres began to form, more and more disillusioned Jewish farmers vacated their wheat fields and became resident merchants in Calgary, Edmonton, Lethbridge and Medicine Hat.

Facilities and institutions began to develop in the early 1900s and Alberta's first rabbis were brought in to provide spiritual guidance.

More immigrants kept coming both from eastern Canada and Europe, pushing the number of Jews in the province to 4,000 by 1951. Today, about 13,000 Jews live in Alberta, mainly in Calgary and Edmonton.

The province's first minyan was held by Jacob Diamond at Calgary in 1894. He also brought in Alberta's first rabbi, Hyman Goldstick, and presided over the building of the first synagogue, the Beth Jacob, in 1911.

From there, Calgary's Jewish community has grown to its present size of about 7,200.

Possessing four congregations, from Reform to Chabad, the community also has two schools, a kosher food store and bakery, a Jewish community centre built in 1979, a senior's residence and a host of other organizations and institutions.

"It's a very dynamic and united community, and an excellent place to raise your family," says Cheryl Shore, president of the Calgary Jewish Community Council.

Governed by a community council, every Jewish organization, from Jewish Family Services to the Orthodox Akiva Academy school, has a seat on the council.

Its main function is to facilitate the community's various institutions and allocate UJA dollars. "But we are still learning not to be a board of hats with our own agendas," Shore explains. "It is a wonderful community because of the lack of turf wars."

The major problems facing the Calgary community are economics and intermarriage, she says.

A lack of funding from federal and provincial governments is having a negative effect on schools and services while assimilation stands at just over 20 per cent.

"The red flag is waving and there is a strengthening in our institutions towards Jewish identity," Shore says.

"But the fact of life is that we are intermarrying, so we need to welcome these couples or else lose the Jewish partner and the children."

Shore says if the community's spirit of pride and volunteerism are continued by the upcoming generation, Calgary's community will continue to attract more newcomers.

"Edmonton has an unfortunate history of having too much of its UJA campaign based on the moderate givers," he says, explaining the reasons for the dollar shortage.

Assimilation in Edmonton is the second highest in the country, nearing 25 per cent, he says, compounding the money problems.

"Everybody in the community is concerned about the issue, so a number of programs and institutions have been set up to try and enhance Jewish continuity."

Elman says the leadership of the community is very young because "a whole generation of potential leaders were simply uninvolved" in the community.

HOME ON THE RANGE

While Calgary's Jewish population is growing in spurts which correspond with the success of the province's oil and gas industries, Alberta's second largest Jewish community in Edmonton has not seen significant growth over the last few years.

Recent Russian immigrants and the arrival of a 10-family ultra-Orthodox kollel two years ago have topped up the population at about 5,500 Jews.

A federated community formally founded in 1906, Edmonton boasts two schools and five congregations, a community centre, a butcher, a kosher mart and a pizza place in the city's famous West Edmonton Mall.

And like Calgary to the south, it too is experiencing financial difficulty, says the city's federation president, Bruce Elman.

And while the federation is planning programs in combination with organizations like Hadassah-WIZO and ORT, it lacks the money to set new programs for the future, like adult education, a high school and library improvements.

At about the time Jews were establishing themselves in Calgary and Edmonton, smaller Jewish communities in Lethbridge and Medicine Hat were also forming.

Mainly from Russia and eastern Canada, these Jews also took up farming and shopkeeping. While both cities had a Jewish population of about 200 in the 1960s, today only a shadow of those communities now remains.

"They still try and get a minyan when someone has a yahrzeit and for the High Holy Days," says Lethbridge native David Bickman of the dozen families, mostly seniors, that still live in the city.

"There hasn't been a rabbi there for 20 years and the community will hardly make it into the next century."

Birkman says the synagogue, built in 1955, is a peculiar mix of Orthodoxy and Conservatism with separate seating at the front and mixed near the back.

As in Lethbridge, most of Medicine Hat's young Jews moved to the bigger centres of Calgary and Edmonton to attend college and never returned.

The Sons of Abraham synagogue in Medicine Hat had eight different rabbis over the years, but now the city's remaining 15 Jews arrange High Holiday services.

"We just keep plugging away and carrying on as best as we can," says congregation member Bert Maltin.

The once proud community which produced Harry Veiner, Medicine Hat's Jewish mayor for 20 years, will only live as long as its senior population holds out, he says.

While only 12 Jews reached Alberta in the late 1800s to establish a Jewish presence in the province, 85 scrambled to the Yukon during the Klondike gold rush of 1897.

Jewish prospectors, miners and merchants from all over the world came to stake their claim.

The first prayer services were held in Dawson City for Rosh Hashanah 1898 in a downtown store, and Yom Kippur was held in the Yukon Pioneer Hall.

The most famous Jewish prospector was Henry Zimmerman, who came from San Francisco to spend 40 years mining his claim. He was found dead in his burned-out wilderness cabin in the early 1940s.

The fledgling Yukon Jewish community of 85 grew to 163 by 1901 but gradually diminished after the gold rush.

Today there are only eight known Jews living in the territory, mainly in Dawson City and Whitehorse, with no formal community organization.

Some are government employees, another is a teacher, one a psychiatrist, one a hotel clerk and there is a husband-and-wife team who run a desktop publishing business.

"I never came across anyone who had been there since the gold rush," says Marty Waldman, an actor who lived in the Yukon for eight years.

"It's so Godforsaken, even Jews didn't go there. I met a Jewish couple in Watson Lake when I was playing a concert. It was like meeting lantsman in the desert," he recalls.

Despite the small number and the inaccessibility, Waldman says Passover seders were very much a part of Jewish life in the Yukon.

Matzah was sent in by family members from other parts of the country and the Haggadah was faxed in and photocopied.

How long those eight Jews will stay in Canada's frozen north Waldman cannot speculate.

He says the reason most of them are living there now is a lifestyle where "no one can bug them."

"They're not there for cultural or community reasons," he says.

"But after you've been there a while, the Yukon is a place you become fiercely loyal to. It supercedes your cultural matrix."

Opinions

Just how much do people change?

I recently came across a long statement on immigration policy, from which the following represents a small excerpt: "We ask nothing else but that our country, which prides itself — and rightly so — on its loyalty to the dictates of scientific knowledge and discovery, as well as its adherence to the moral law, should no longer rely on so significant a portion of our legal and legislative structure on foundations so thoroughly and irrevocably exploded by science and research, and so unequivocally denied by every religious and moral tenet.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

"Our strength as a nation has not depended merely upon our great material riches, but it has depended far more upon our diversity of peoples and cultures and upon our unique ability to fashion a creative national unity out of that diversity, without penalizing the differences. Our people has not been nourished at a single font; it has drawn from many springs and it must continue to draw from many springs if it is to remain strong.

"While it is true that we have an obligation to protect ourselves against those who would seek to enter the country for purposes of subverting our democratic system of government, we cannot allow ourselves to be party to a sentiment which poorly disguises its hostility to all immigration and all immigrants. Further, our strength and vigor as a nation has come, in large measure, from the polyglot peoples, the cast-offs of other nations who fled to the autocracies of other lands to build a stronghold of freedom in our country. I read our public sentiment and then I remember the inscription on the Statue of Liberty in the United States. 'Give me your tired, your poor ...' Which expresses better the spirit of the land? Can there be any doubt?"

Anti-immigrant feeling persists

The above is not a comment on current Canadian affairs, but was testimony I gave before the House of Representatives in Washington in 1952.

The President's Commission on Immigration and Naturalization was then holding hearings, and I represented the Minnesota Jewish Council. It pains me to see how much of this anti-immigrant feeling still persists both in the United States and in Canada, both nations of immigrants.

I continue to believe that we Jews have a special responsibility to keep the spirit of fairness alive in this country, as in fact Jews should do in every country in which they reside and have become the beneficiaries of freedom.

This freedom is rarely destroyed from without; it erodes more usually from within, when people forget that compassion, understanding and fairness are essential elements of our liberty. Canada is poorly served when we apply these sentiments exclusively to ourselves.

You will be interested to know how well Canada did in the refugee-accepting process during the year 1994. Some 22,000 claims were made and were referred to the Convention Refugee Determination Division by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

In 1994, 70 per cent of all claimants who were processed were granted refugee status. Some 3,000 claims were withdrawn or abandoned.

The major refugee-producing countries for Canada were Sri Lanka, Somalia, Iran and the republics of the former USSR. They accounted for approximately one-third of all claims, and the rest were distributed all over the world. The present backlog of claims yet to be heard is around 17,000.

Skeptical about Syria

During his last visit to Damascus, Secretary of State Warren Christopher hoped to obtain more than just the resumption of the Syrian-Israeli peace talks that were interrupted by Syria last December. But Damascus felt that what the United States had to offer in return for Syrian concessions was less than it expected, and that American promises cannot be relied upon, now that the Republican-dominated legislature, isolationist and hostile to Syria, may not support them.

By Yeshayahu Anug

Nor does President Hafez al-Assad trust Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, though the latter must have indicated that the gradual restitution of the Golan, in return for iron-clad security arrangements, can be negotiated.

Until now, many observers thought the possibility of a Likud victory in the next elections would prompt Assad to rush into a deal with Rabin. But Damascus suspects that Rabin's hints were mere tactics. If Likud can indeed win the next elections and annul an accord reached with the Labor government, why not wait and see before signing a binding commitment to peace?

Those who do not believe full conciliation with Syria is in the cards have some strong arguments to support their skepticism.

Syria is a very closed society, they say, firmly ruled by a ruthless dictator who has given his country a long period of relative stability and has for many years enjoyed the backing of the former Soviet Union and an open credit line for his military planning aimed at reaching strategic parity with Israel. Israel's military superiority still constitutes a humiliating threat to Syria's self-perceived role as the custodian of Arab nationalism.

True, the fall of the Soviet Union was a fatal loss to Syrian regional designs, but the blow was in some measure softened by its alignment with the western coalition against Iraq. This forced the United States to treat Syria, the pariah country which promotes terrorism and helps the international drug cartels, a little more gently than would have otherwise been the case.

It was logical for the United States to engage Syria in the peace process with Israel and for Israel to cooperate with the idea, at a time when the remodeling of the Middle East seemed to be a credible option. This was the time when Assad presumably made his strategic decision to change course vis-a-vis Israel and to aim at "a peace between the braves," as he called it, albeit on his unyielding conditions.

But so much has happened since. The grand design of the New World Order that was to replace the Cold War was soon crippled by the wave of nationalist and ethnic clashes and by financial disorder worldwide. The unchallenged clout of the United States was clearly affected and its efforts to influence international conduct were severely limited by the unsuccessful attempts to stem local conflicts everywhere. And right now the American mood is inward-looking and the internal power structure is shifting.

Assad looks around and seems more and more undecided as to what he should now do regarding Israel. The policy of conciliation was presented to him by the American administration — and to some extent by the Europeans — as the solution to his problems. But he not only distrusts Rabin's preparedness to return the Golan, but also the American readiness to offset the political costs of such radical change in its position.

Assad also suspects that once an agreement for the return of the Golan is reached, the continuation of his occupation of Lebanon will become untenable. He may feel the price to pay for the return of the Golan is not worth it. He may also worry about the reaction of his regimented population to the winds of liberalization which will blow into his country once the wall of separation from Israel will start crumbling. Surely, he can control the situation for a while, but for how long?

Assad may not be so desperate as to take risks. Syria's economic situation is bad but not too dramatic. Unlike other Arab countries, he has no serious problems with Islamic fundamentalists, which are fewer and more intimidated by his regime than elsewhere.

True, western economic investments may be stimulated by a relaxed environment and by the improvement of his relations with the United States. But that might expose his firmly controlled society to the dangers resulting from a relaxation of his iron hand.

Why endanger the wall he has so meticulously constructed around his country and lose the benefits of his good relations with Iran? Why rock the boat? It was always difficult to read the inscrutable Syrian president, but what can be understood is what is at stake for him. He surely wants the Golan back but hesitates to endanger political survival to the uncertainties of what may follow.

The peace talks between Israel and Syria have now resumed and may even be upgraded. This is undoutedly a positive development. But do not expect quick results. The partners are — and for good reasons — both still very cautious.

Things that endure

It is not generally known that the rite of spring cleaning is rooted in Jewish tradition. It stems from the erev Pesach practice of preparing for the holiday by cleansing the house of all things chometz.

By Jack Chisvin

With Pesach at hand, we have completed our spring cleaning and retrieved the boxes of Pesach things — pots, pans, utensils, cutlery, dishes and other special things, from the basement. While shlepping the boxes I came to realize what a thing-ridden world we live in.

Human history is recorded through a preoccupation with things — things made out of stone, clay, iron, bronze, glass and precious metals — things for survival and for vanity. Over time things have become endowed with mystical powers, social influence, political significance and international prestige. Judging countries by their standard of living is simply a counting of things — refrigerators, television sets, automobiles, computers, toilets.

We are compulsive about making things: widgets, gizmos, doohickeys, whachamacallits, thingumajigs and thingumabobs. We take non-things like food and by processing them, freezing them and packaging them, make them into things. A thing is easier to cope with than a fact of nature in the raw. If we don't need a thing for ourselves, we sell it or trade it for other things. On a national scale we call this commerce.

Humans are acquisitors and creatures of clutter. Clutter is what happens to things when they become useless but remain friendly. Sooner or later we are forced to make decisions about things, lest we be defeated by them, lest as consumers we become consumed ourselves, lest we become overwhelmed and buried. The ancient Egyptians had the good sense to take their things to the grave. We on the other hand, believe "you can't take it with you" and not only continuously accumulate things, but inherit others.

There are some who give the appearance of staying ahead of things. People whose desks are always neat and uncluttered, like tidy altars ornamented with the ritual things of business: the onyx-based pen stand, the silver framed family photograph, the tooled leather portfolio, the empty "in-out" basket — symbols of decisiveness and mastery over things. I suspect however, that such desks beneath their pristine surfaces have drawers weighted with indecisions — undigested memos, knots of elastic bands, dried up erasers, a collection of promotional ballpoint pens — things seemingly impossible to throw away, no matter how useless.

The more valuable the thing the less likely we are to use it. Our best silver and crystal, inherited from parents, grandparents and great-grandparents, are stored in boxes in the basement only to appear for the one week of Pesach.

Amongst other things that appeared in our boxes containing Pesach things was a matzah cover made by our youngest child as a nursery school project. We presented it to her youngest child to compare with his own matzah cover made in nursery school. Examining it with the curiosity of a 4-year-old he took it apart and out fell a matzah, perfectly preserved after 30 years. He promptly ate it.

Maybe some things don't endure forever after all.

Israel and the Holocaust

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

For better or worse, the Holocaust is indelibly etched into the consciousness of Israeli society. It has affected Israel's identity as well as its politics, both in peace and in war.

The truth of this maxim was illustrated yet again recently when Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin caused an uproar by suggesting that official foreign visitors no longer be required to visit the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial in Jerusalem.

Yet interestingly enough, there was once a time in Israel when, as Tom Segev writes in The Seventh Million (HarperCollins, $19.95 paperback), the Holocaust was enveloped in "a great silence."

In the aftermath of World War II, when almost one out of three Israelis was classified as a survivor, the Holocaust was widely regarded with ambivalence. There was sorrow, of course, but also shame that millions of Jews had perished "like sheep." As a result, many Israelis preferred not to think about the greatest tragedy to befall the Jewish people.

But since the Eichmann trial, the Holocaust has come out of Israel's collective closet, to the point where it is now practically a constant preoccupation.

Segev, a serious Israeli journalist whose previous work was 1949: The First Israelis, addresses this theme in The Seventh Million, an engrossing and important book which draws on original research.

Segev, whose parents were German refugees fleeing Nazi persecution, does not merely content himself with the period after the Holocaust, but also considers what came before. That is to say, he closely examines the yishuv's relations with Germany, the settlement of German Jews in Palestine and the attitude of the Zionist movement to the unfolding Shoah.

It may be surprising to some that the yishuv had more or less normal ties with Germany from Hitler's accession to power in 1933 to the outbreak of World War II in 1939. There was trade, formalized by the so-called transfer (haavara) accord. There were mail, telephone and financial links. People travelled back and forth.

To be sure, Palestinian Jews mounted protests against Germany's anti-Semitic politics. But ultimately the pragmatists in the yishuv prevailed, convinced that a boycott of Germany would not advance Jewish interests in Palestine. Indeed, more than a few Zionists even described the Nazi persecution of Jews as "punishment" for their unwillingness to make aliyah.

Approximately 50,000 German Jews, or about 10 percent of the refugees, settled in Palestine during the Third Reich. Called yekkes, they were often mocked for their formality and bearing. Yet their contributions did not go unrecognized.

The first news of the extermination of European Jewry reached Palestine in June 1942, writes Segev. There were rallies and demonstrations and acts of public mourning. But after the second half of 1943, front-page headlines in Jewish newspapers related to the Holocaust gave way to inside stories.

The spectre of a German invasion of Palestine, then controlled by Britain, produced a series of schemes to repel the invader. One idea, the Northern Plan, envisaged a last stand on Mount Carmel or perhaps elsewhere in the Galilee.

David Ben-Gurion, chair of the Jewish Agency, considered the Holocaust a catastrophe for Zionism. Yet, Segev observes, the Zionist movement was too weak to meaningfully help Jews in Nazi-occupied Europe.

By 1949, nearly 350,000 Holocaust survivors had arrived in Israel. About one-third were resettled in buildings abandoned by Palestinian Arabs during the War of Independence, which exacted a toll on the survivors. Segev claims that one out of three of the casualties in that war was sustained by survivors who, he adds, were not brilliant fighters.

Hatred of Germany was rampant in the new-born state. The editor of the daily Ha'aretz proposed legislation barring Israelis from any social contacts with German citizens, while the Foreign Ministry decreed that Israeli passports were not valid in Germany.

Despite this, Israel negotiated a reparations agreement with West Germany. Segev reckons that the funds were invaluable in developing Israel's industrial infrastructure. He cites a Bank of Israel estimate that 15 percent of the country's growth, and 45,000 jobs, could be attributed to investments made with reparations monies.

In 1957, Israel established secret military relations with West Germany. The architect of that policy was Shimon Peres, then director-general of the Ministry of Defence. Under the agreement, Israel received German weaponry such as aircraft and tanks free of charge and sold Germany arms. Furthermore, Israeli pilots and officers were sent to Germany for advanced training.

David Ben-Gurion confers with Konrad Adenauer in New York City in May 1960.

These contacts, Segev suggests, laid the groundwork for Ben-Gurion's historic encounter with West German Chancellor Konrad Adenauer in New York City on May 14, 1960. At the meeting, Ben-Gurion asked for more arms and a $250 million loan for the development of the Negev.

Diplomatic relations were established in 1965, following a Knesset vote which ratified the agreement by a margin of 66-29. Not surprisingly, there were angry demonstrations. Still, Israel's bilateral relationship with West Germany grew to be durable.

The atrocities of the Holocaust had a profound effect on Israeli society.

By the mid-1950s, upwards of 30 Jews suspected of collaborating with the Nazis had been investigated, though only a few were actually indicted. These proceedings caused much anguish in Israel.

For politicians, the Holocaust was a useful tool. When Israel was condemned for its 1956 invasion of the Sinai Peninsula, several Knesset members justifed the operation by citing the Holocaust.

On the tense eve of the 1967 Six Day War, Israeli newspapers identified Egypt's president, Gamal Abdel Nasser, with Hitler. And during the 1982 war in Lebanon, Menachem Begin, the prime minister, wrote a letter to the president of the United States likening Israel's bombardment of PLO chairman Yasser Arafat's headquarters in Beirut with the destruction of Hitler's bunker in Berlin.

As might be expected, the Eichmann trial was a watershed in Israeli history. Segev says it served two purposes — to remind the nations of the world that the Holocaust obligated them to support Israel, and to reinforce the Jewish identity of Israelis, particularly the younger generation. (More than two decades later, the John Demjanjuk trial [or mistrial] was used to achieve similar goals.)

Not without reason, Segev claims that the legacy of the Holocaust insinuated itself into the national debate about the disposition of the territories captured by Israel in the Six Day War. Doves who opposed the military occupation, as well as hawks who sought to retain these lands, both harkened back to the Holocaust to justify their positions. More recently, Benjamin Netanyahu, the Likud leader, spoke out against returning to Israel's pre-1967 "Auschwitz borders."

The Holocaust as an historical leitmotif also surfaced during the 1976 Entebbe hijacking. When it was learned that Israelis had been separated from the rest of the passengers, the "selection" process in the Nazi concentration camps was evoked.

More than any prime minister before or since, Begin — himself a survivor — deployed Holocaust imagery to strengthen his policies. He justified the 1981 air raid on Iraq's nuclear reactor by declaring: "We must protect our nation, a million and a half of whose children were murdered by the Nazis..." And prior to Israel's invasion of Lebanon, he remarked, "There is no other way than to fight selflessly. Believe me, the alternative is Treblinka."

Finally, the Holocaust has weighed heavily on Israel's education system.

The first lessons on the Holocaust were given in 1953, eight years after the last concentration camps were liberated. But not until 1979 did the Ministry of Education require Holocaust studies to be mandatory for senior high school students.

Today, Segev notes, consciousness of the Holocaust is increasing in Israel. In a 1992 study on Jewish identity, almost 80 percent of the respondents agreed with the statement, "We are all Holocaust survivors."

Mideast Analysis

The Hula Project

When Israel was barely three years old, struggling to absorb new immigrants, build industry and defend its borders, the government launched its first major development project — the draining of the Hula swamplands in northeastern Galilee.

Considered a feat of Zionist pioneering, it was spearheaded by the Jewish National Fund (JNF).

The work began in January 1951 and took seven years to complete. The driving forces were economics and politics. Thousands of acres of prime agricultural land would be reclaimed, while millions of gallons of swamp water that had been lost through evaporation would be channeled to the Sea of Galilee via a network of canals. At the insistence of naturalists, 750 acres in the swamp would be turned into a nature reserve.

It all seemed like a good idea. A malarial swamp would be drained, giving Israel 15,000 acres of additional arable soil, as well as a chance to become self-sufficient in the production of food for a growing population.

Israel also wanted to make a political point. A segment of the swamplands lay in a demilitarized zone which the United Nations had staked out in the wake of the 1948 War of Independence. Israel and Syria both claimed title to it, and the territorial dispute touched off fighting which ebbed and flowed.

For years, Israel basked in the apparent success of the project, not realizing it was damaging the fragile ecosystem of the Hula Valley. Soon it dawned on officials that there was a gap between the project's expectations and its consequences.

In an environmental disaster, the water table dropped, the dry peat burned in underground fires, the fertility of the soil declined and nitrate pollutants seeped into the Sea of Galilee. As wind and dust storms carried off soil, the Hula Valley was invaded by rodents and weeds. Farmers and environmentalists threw up their hands in despair.

Reviewing the situation, the JNF decided that the only way to save these precious wetlands from self-destruction was to reflood sectors of the Hula Valley that had been inadvertently despoiled by the drainage project.

The partial reflooding of the Hula Valley, begun in November 1993, will take up to five years to finish. As part of the rehabilitation process, the Jordan River around Kibbutz Kfar Blum has been restored to its original course by means of a dam and a water diversion facility. The entire undertaking, which is being called the largest environmental project in the Middle East, will cost about $15 million (US), according to a JNF official in Jerusalem.

The areas to be reflooded will become a complex of parks tailor-made for tourists.

The restoration of the marshes is expected to bring back migratory birds and exotic animals, thereby restoring the valley's natural flora and fauna.

Rabbinic Reflections

By RABBI WILLIAM Z. EISENSTEIN

Is the Torah outdated? Is the Torah only for the past? In the parshat hashavuah, the Torah portion of the week to be read this coming Shabbat morning, the Torah talks about the Metzorah, the leper.

The Torah enumerates in great detail the symptoms of what resembles the disease of leprosy. There are three types of leprosy mentioned in the Torah. One, leprosy of the skin. Two, leprosy of the clothes one wears and three, leprosy of a house. The Torah tells us that the person exhibiting these symptoms was to go the kohen, the priest, and he would examine the symptoms and advise the person as what he is to do.

Are these laws relevant to us today in our modern times? Our chazal, our rabbis of blessed memory, explain that the greatness of the Torah is that it is timeless. It is as relevant today as it was in the generation it was given to.

Loshen hara can lead to disaster

The rabbis ask, why is a person afflicted with tzoraat? One of the answers given is that this leprosy-like illness can afflict a person who speaks loshen hara (one who says something about someone that is true, false or intended to hurt someone). Often what someone says about another is true. It is not intended necessarily to hurt someone. The objective is to feel good by repeating something about someone that another person does not know. The effect is disastrous. As a result people learn not to trust each other.

It is clear from the Torah in enumerating in detail the laws of tzoraat that this kind of behavior should be condemned. If a society or people are to get along and be united people must trust each other.

Perhaps what the Torah is teaching us is the correct behavior that unites people instead of dividing them. Perhaps we should learn to greet each other instead of being angry with each other; say hello to each other with a smile and respect each other. It is not for us to judge each other. For this we have a G-d.

What a beautiful and united Jewish people we would be if we smiled at each other, greeted each other pleasantly and respected each other. If we behave in such a manner we will learn to trust and respect each other. We the Jewish people are in need of less condemnation of each other and more tolerance and respect for each other. The lesson is as relevant today as the day the Torah was given.

Rabbi William Eisenstein is the principal of the Hamilton Hebrew Academy.

Service to emphasize youth

TORONTO — Jewish youth in Toronto are being encouraged to take part in a candlelight march from the Yad Vashem Holocaust Monument in Earl Bales Park to Adath Israel Synagogue, where this year's Yom Hashoah service will take place April 26.

The entire community is invited to attend a brief service at the monument, to start at 7 p.m. Poetry readings and a wreath-laying are planned. Candles will then be distributed for the march to the synagogue, where the main service will begin at 8 p.m.

The theme of this year's Yom Hashoah's service — which falls close to the 50th anniversary of the end of World War II — is From generation to generation. As such, the emphasis is on Jewish youth.

The Toronto Jewish Youth Council is involved in the program's planning. The council is comprised of representatives of B'nei Akiva, NAHON, B'nai Brith Youth Organization, United Synagogue Youth (USY), the National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY), Tzabar and North Eastern Lakes Federation of Temple Youth (NELFTY).

For information, call the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem at 905-660-6028.

There's much more to Pesach than matzah

By ARNOLD R. GLICK

"And on the fifteenth day of the first month is the feast of unleavened bread; seven days ye shall eat unleavened bread."

This is the biblical directive instructing us that during the week of Passover, no bread is to be eaten. The reason is easy to understand. As is stated in the Haggadah, "The dough of our forefathers did not have sufficient time to rise ... for they were driven from Egypt and could not linger."

That explains the matzah.

GUEST VOICES

But, as any Passover food shopper knows, there is much more to Passover foods than matzah. Even in all of its many forms — matzah farfel, matzah meal, matzah crackers, matzah balls — matzah is not the primary filler of supermarket shelf space. That's because in recent years many other food items have become part of contemporary Passover tradition.

Let's start with the holiday's No. 1 non-matzah food item: Passover candy. It's everywhere. You can't avoid it, even if you try. In college I had a friend who — convinced the Israelites fled Egypt without fruit gels or caramel cashew clusters — was determined to likewise survive the week without candy. It was impossible. She broke down less than four hours into the holiday as the second box of assorted chocolates was being passed around the seder table.

Of course Passover candy is nothing new. I remember, as a child in the 1960s, accompanying my mother when she did the Passover shopping. At that time the Jewish community of my city was moving out to the suburbs, and there was but a small remnant of Jewish storekeepers in what was once a bustling neighborhood of Jewish commerce. Every year before Passover my mother made sure we visited each of the remaining Jewish grocery stores so that we could help them, in our small way, by giving them our Passover business.

I remember anticipating our annual trip with a mixture of melancholy and excitement. The sadness came from seeing the poor Jewish storekeepers struggling to hold on. The excitement was in knowing these old-fashioned grocery stores held a wonderful variety of Passover candy.

It was the 1970s that ushered in another now-essential Passover food item: the Passover cake mix. Over the years I have perfected my baking technique (knowing exactly how many drops of water it takes to get the frosting just right is just one of my culinary talents), and I cannot imagine getting through the holiday without the traditional making of the chocolate cake. As of the late 1980s, this ritual has become even easier — I can now buy a Passover cake mix made especially for the microwave!

The early 1990s brought innovation to the morning meal with the introduction of the Passover breakfast cereal. You can now have your choice of fruit-flavored, cocoa-flavored, or plain, in a variety of crispy little shapes. And to think of all the years I survived on farfel and milk.

Which brings me to the current food-shopping season. I call this the year of the kosher-for-Passover pizza mix, in recognition of yet another amazing product designed to fill a hitherto unaddressed dietary need.

Indeed, the variety of Passover food items this year appears to be greater than ever, as a walk down the supermarket's Passover aisle will attest. And what I find most intriguing is that virtually all of these products have been created, distributed and marketed for a consumption period that lasts just eight days.

When, as a child, I would return home from Passover shopping with my exotic candy treats, my older brother would say, "If we manage to get along all year without chocolate lollipops and coconut-covered marshmallows, why is it necessary to have them on Passover?"

I suppose the same can be asked about many of the food items mentioned above. But to me the answer is really quite obvious. After all, man cannot live by matzah alone.

Hebrew literacy day planned

TORONTO — Hundreds of people across Canada will learn to read Hebrew in just eight hours.

The course designed for people who have never learned to read Hebrew, or for those who have learned and forgotten, will be given April 23 in 16 locations across Canada (including five in Toronto).

Scheduled in honor of Yom Ha'atzmaut — Israel Independence Day — the classes cost $47 (Israel's age) and promise to be fun and easy. The fee includes a light lunch, textbook and all materials.

Sponsored by Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, and ARZA, the Canadian Council of Reform Zionists, the course is open to anyone with a desire to learn Hebrew. It is ideal for parents who would like to be directly involved in their children's Hebrew education.

"Hebrew literacy is the key to unlocking the treasures of Jewish identity, tradition and history," said Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, director of Kolel. "It provides direct access to the richness of Torah, rabbinic text and modern Israeli literature which are central to Jewish spiritual renewal."

Using a methodology developed by Rabbi Noah Golinkin, founder of the Hebrew Literacy Campaign and rabbi emeritus of Congregation Beth Shalom of Columbia, Md., students at the National Hebrew Literacy Day program will learn to read the alef-bet through sight recognition, and will master basic prayers and blessings.

Over 70,000 students in the past decade have been successful using this system.

Teachers in the Toronto area will be trained by Rabbi Golinkin in a three-hour session. In other locations, the teachers will be trained by video.

"Short of aliyah," said Dr. Harvey Zimmerman, President of ARZA/Canada, "learning Hebrew is the most Zionistic activity in which one can be involved."

ARZA/Canada is the Zionist voice of the Reform movement in Canada.

Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning is the community adult education program of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism. Formed in 1991 under Rabbi Goldstein, its goal is to infuse people's lives with Jewish meaning by providing a focal point for Jewish study that is serious yet accessible to liberal Jews. I'm Associated With Success

Irving Eisner, survivor of Birkenau, Dachau, Warsaw and Lansberg/Kaufering, made a vow to G-d that, if he was spared, he would devote his life to teaching Jewish children. Mr. Eisner kept his promise and for the last 30 years has been a teacher and supervisor at Associated Hebrew Schools.

"I cannot envision a solid, deep-rooted confirmation of our people without a proper Jewish education. For me that means to raise a Jewish child, to educate, to mould a personality, to instill the following values: Torah, Derech-Eretz, Ahavat Israel, Ahavat Medinat Israel – to allow a child to become a mentch."

You too can make a commitment to Jewish education.

JNF chair named

VICTORIA — Kelowna resident Mel Kotler has been appointed the first national small communities chair of the Jewish National Fund of Canada.

Kotler, a former Montrealer, was the driving force behind the 100-family Okanagan Jewish Community, which opened a Jewish community centre and the Beth Shalom Synagogue.

"Small Jewish communities have a very strong bond to Israel and have been looking for a way to become more involved in extending that bond," Kotler said.

He is not sure how many communities he will be working with, "[but] I'll try to assist, motivate or otherwise help them in any way I can to undertake successful programs for Israel."

Simchah suppliers team up to aid United Jewish Appeal

TORONTO — Simchah suppliers here — consultants, caterers, florists, photographers, makeup artists, orchestra leaders — are combining to benefit United Jewish Appeal (UJA).

They have agreed to give UJA $10 from every contract, through the newly formed Simcha Association — the first of its kind in Canada. All association members will be participants in the UJA program.

"We're trying to give something back to the community that has supported us," said Simcha Association founder Larry Rodness.

Rodness conceived the idea after he had attended a meeting of UJA's Arts & Entertainment Division. Because he was uncomfortable doing telephone canvassing, Rodness sought a fundraising alternative and the association concept was born.

An association sticker will be attached to all contracts as confirmation of the supplier's contribution to UJA on behalf of the family having the simchah. Rodness hopes those planning an affair will insist on dealing with association members.

Both Rodness and association co-chair David Berk are encouraged by the response so far. They do not anticipate a negative reaction from their colleagues. In fact, they expect strong support from non-Jewish professionals as well.

The Simcha Association does not benefit UJA only; it makes good business sense for its members.

"These days, there's less work and more competition," said Rodness. "Everybody's looking for an edge to do a job. Through the association, we're doing PR for ourselves."

Forming the association also accomplishes the industry's long-sought objective of creating an organization to share common concerns and ideas.

"We deal with each other all the time. We work with each other on a regular basis, so why not get together?," asked Berk.

Once the association takes off in Toronto, Rodness wants to export the concept to other major cities.

"We're not demanding this of anyone," he said. "It's simply a suggestion. Nobody in our business is going to be audited."

Former MP co-authoring book on Pollard case

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — What makes Simma Holt run?

These days, apart from several projects percolating in her ever-bustling mind, the 73-year-old author, broadcaster and barrier breaker (as Canada's first Jewish female Member of Parliament), it's a book about Jonathan Pollard, the convicted American spy for Israel.

Holt speaks excitedly, almost frenetically, about the project, like an investigative reporter who's on to something. In this case, though, she is an investigative reporter and she's certain she's on to something — something big.

Holt, who's co-authoring the book with Pollard's sister Carol, says the story will contain fresh facts about the convoluted caper, including plenty of "dirt" on the administrations of former U.S. president Ronald Reagan and George Bush.

Pollard, a former U.S. navy intelligence analyst, pleaded guilty in 1985 to passing classified information to Israel.

He'd been charged with one count of passing secrets to an ally during peacetime, for which the average sentence is four years. In return for a promise of leniency, Pollard agreed to forfeit a trial. He was then sentenced to life imprisonment, with no chance for parole and today languishes in a Butner, N.C., jail.

Those are the barest bones. Holt, who addressed Temple Sinai's sisterhood last Sunday on the subject, says she's discovering the real meat.

She didn't divulge much in a CJN interview last week, just that she first became involved in the case in 1988, when she was asked to work on Bush's election campaign. She says she quit six weeks prior to the election because "I saw Bush was a phoney. And there was lots of anti-Semitism around, including from Bush himself."

Simma Holt

But she did stumble on documents detailing the Pollard affair, and they shocked her. Holt says her book will expose a vast, complex web of hatred directed against Israel, U.S. Jews and Pollard, beginning with the so-called October Surprise: allegations that leading Republicans — including, supposedly, Bush — convinced Iran to delay the release of the 52 American hostages in Tehran in order to bring about the election of Reagan in 1980.

Then, there's the connection to the pro-Arab Bechtel Engineering Corp., whose one-time executives included former U.S. defence secretary Caspar Weinberger and former secretary of state George Shultz. Weinberger, says Holt, played a leading role in putting Pollard away, just as Reagan and Bush were getting cozier with Saudi Arabia.

Holt puts a pox on all of them but reserves extra harsh words for James Baker, Bush's secretary of state and Republican fixer. She calls him "the most evil man you ever met."

She says a New York agent is interested in the book, her fifth. She held the seat of Vancouver-Kingsway for Pierre Trudeau's Liberals from 1974 to 1979. That was after 30 years in daily journalism at the Vancouver Sun.

Holt says Pollard's plight ultimately holds a grave message for us all: "If one Jew can lose his freedom, none of us is safe."

SUBSTANCE ABUSE AND JEWISH WOMEN

by RACHEL WEINSTOCK

Should the fight against substance abuse be a women's issue and beyond that a Jewish women's issue?

"Yes," says the Social and Political Action Committee of Jewish Women's Federation. According to its co-chairs Agi Mandel and Marina Shear, the committee is preparing a program on substance abuse on May 10. Substance abuse is the use of addictive substances including alcohol, cigarettes, and illegal or sometimes even legal drugs.

The special needs of women in treatment for their addictions, some factors that contribute to women's substance abuse, and the frequent over-medication of women are among the issues that will be included in the program. Mandel points out that Jewish women who are substance abusers have both the problems associated with being women and those connected with being Jewish. The committee also hopes to sound a wake-up call to the Jewish community about the need to confront substance abuse among Jews, and to support measures aimed at treatment and prevention.

"Jewish women who are substance abusers have both the problems associated with being women and those connected with being Jewish."

Gone are the days when "women's issues" strictly focused on sameness: promoting the perception that women and men have the same needs. Today, many women's issues focus on difference. One example is the recognition that medical studies using male subjects do not necessarily apply to women. This has led to demands by women's advocates for increased funding of research on women's health. Similarly, the perception is emerging that causes and treatment of substance abuse are not the same in women as in men.

According to the Addiction Research Foundation, women are at a higher risk of substance abuse if they have a family history of drug and alcohol problems, if they are on their own or unemployed, or if they have a spouse who is a heavy drinker or drug user. When they seek treatment, women often see substance abuse as a secondary problem or a symptom of a larger problem such as physical abuse.

Rochelle Thompson, a veteran of 25 years in private practice as a clinical counsellor and a specialist in addictions, agrees that for women more than for men, addiction is a way of coping with trauma: 40-70% of women substance abusers have experienced sexual or physical abuse. And piled on top of all the other problems that addicts face are some issues she identifies as specific to or harder to handle for women:

- Shame, stigma and self-blaming are often stronger for women. They hide their substance abuse and fear exposure more than men.
- Women encounter more barriers to getting help. For example, since single women tend to have less money than men, they may find it harder to cope financially during treatment. Single mothers who need day care services while getting treatment can experience added financial and emotional stress.
- Hormonal changes can trigger substance cravings, so PMS (pre-menstrual syndrome) and post natal depression can set off substance abuse. Frequent cycles of emotional and physical changes can also trigger the need for addictive substances.
- Addictions in women develop faster and cause more severe damage.
- Women might choose to use marijuana -- a gateway to the use of other drugs -- because they want to avoid the weight problems that come with the extra calories of alcohol.
- Doctors prescribe more tranquilizers for women than for men, though this situation is beginning to change. Since over-medication of the elderly is also a common problem, elderly women are even more at risk.
- Mothers can feel intense guilt for the ways their substance abuse has influenced their children, and might leave residential treatment because they fear their children are being neglected.
- Women in recovery may be sabotaged by male partners.
- Attempting to be a "superwoman" sometimes leads a woman to substance abuse to help her cope with the pressures of her lifestyle.

Since there are so many aspects of addiction that are specific to women, logic suggests that these differences should be reflected in treatment. But there are few facilities as yet that provide treatment options tailored to women's needs. One such facility in Toronto is the Jean Tweed Centre. Another is the Women's Day Treatment Program at the Addiction Research Foundation. And at the Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS), counselling is done on a one-to-one basis.

Thompson suggests that women need segregated treatment for several reasons:

- In group therapy sessions or in 12-step programs such as Alcoholics Anonymous, men tend to dominate the conversation.
- Sexual abuse issues and traumatic childhood experiences need to be addressed in groups for women only.
- Women need to learn, without the presence of men, how to handle the stress in their relationships.
- Hormonal trigger problems concern only women.
- Women need to consider care issues.

If major obstacles to women's seeking treatment are the shame and stigma of substance abuse, Jewish women get a double dose. These feelings are stronger in the Jewish community, says Annette Crandell of JF&CS. Since standards are--or are perceived to be--higher, Jewish substance abusers feel more shame. In addition, Jews sometimes feel uncomfortable about participating in 12-step programs like Alcoholics Anonymous which are often held in churches, and which can have references to Christian scripture. Several synagogues have recently opened their doors to AA meetings to help Jewish substance abusers feel more comfortable.

Both Crandell and Thompson stress the importance of greater awareness in the Jewish community of substance abuse that often masquerades as family or mental health problems. In particular, Rabbis and other professionals to whom substance abusers might turn need to realize that treatment and counselling for addiction is a specialized skill that calls for referral to trained therapists.

Supplying detailed information to these professionals on resources available to the Jewish community might be useful. But as an overall constructive approach to dealing with substance abuse, lessening shame and stigma might be the most important and effective step for encouraging members of the Jewish community to seek the help they need to overcome their addictions.

THE OTHER KIND OF CHILD ABUSE

by BONNY WOLFOND

Children who are emotionally abused are not black and blue; they are not cut or bleeding. In fact, they do not appear battered at all -- on the outside. Nevertheless, emotional maltreatment is an insidious form of child abuse, and is likely to leave a child with deep, permanent scars. And unlike physical abuse, it is not always easy to see which children are suffering.

What is emotional child abuse? Eric Kirsh, supervisor of special resources at Jewish Family and Child Service says that, "basically, emotional abuse is constant verbal assault, blaming, belittling, rejecting behavior or insistence that a child assume responsibilities that she/he is incapable of handling, which ultimately results in the child feeling inadequate and demeaned."

Neglect, says Kirsh, can also be a form of emotional abuse, "when it impairs the child's emotional or intellectual growth." Extreme lack of stimulation, for example, can lead to delays in infant responsiveness and development. Emotional abuse can also include extreme isolation of a child or terrorizing a child by making her/him excessively afraid of the world at large.

Typically, parents and other primary caregivers are in the position to hurt children most with emotionally abusive behavior. Dave Fleming, Intake Supervisor of the Toronto East branch of the Children's Aid Society, explains that it is particularly traumatic for a child to be emotionally mistreated by a parent because this is the very person that the child trusts most and relies on the most heavily in day-to-day life. When others emotionally abuse a child, it is still damaging but the effects are likely to be less severe because the relationship is less significant.

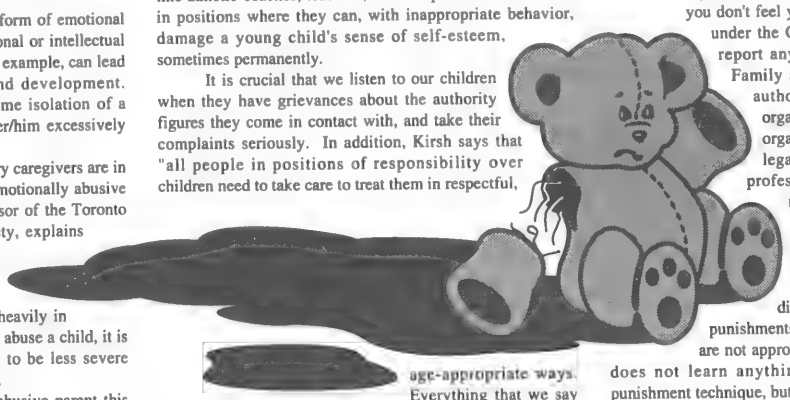
Fleming profiles the emotionally-abusive parent this way: "Parents or guardians who have low self-esteem are often emotional abusers. These are frequently parents who were themselves emotionally abused and are now parenting the way that they were parented.

"They take out the problems of the world on the child, kicking their kid emotionally if they have a bad day at work or find themselves under a lot of pressure." With these families, every message that goes out to the child ends up being negative in some way, either overtly or covertly.

Of course, we are all human. Most parents are capable of losing their tempers, sometimes saying things they don't mean and know they should not have said. If you are one of these, don't panic. Fleming says "Emotional abuse is a cumulative effect - kids are very resilient and they can put up with all sorts of things. We are all going to make mistakes which we can always go back and deal with." Fleming suggests that a simple apology can do wonders, both in restoring a child's sense of self-esteem and in conveying the message that it is all right to acknowledge our own mistakes.

While it is most common for a parent or guardian to emotionally mistreat children, there are many other people who come into a child's life who can hurt her/him. People like athletic coaches, teachers, and camp counsellors are all in positions where they can, with inappropriate behavior, damage a young child's sense of self-esteem, sometimes permanently.

It is crucial that we listen to our children when they have grievances about the authority figures they come in contact with, and take their complaints seriously. In addition, Kirsh says that "all people in positions of responsibility over children need to take care to treat them in respectful, age-appropriate ways. Everything that we say and do around children will be picked up as some form of message."



Generally, emotional abuse is hard to detect and harder to prove. Out of 47,000 reported cases of child abuse or neglect in Ontario in 1993, only 4,727(10%) were reports of emotional maltreatment. In reality, emotional child abuse occurs far more often. Clearly, something else must be done.

How can you tell if a child is being emotionally abused? Signals from children include regressive behavior like bedwetting, stuttering, thumb sucking (in children who have already passed these stages) and hyperactivity, withdrawal, psychosomatic complaints and delinquency. But these behaviors can begin to appear for other reasons, so the best way to discover emotional abuse is to witness it first hand. Kirsh says that abuse can be set apart from the occassional temper flare-up by its intensity, degree, and frequency.

If you ever see someone you know treating a child in an emotionally abusive way, try to approach them and suggest that they get help. Jewish Family and Child Service is one organization among many which offers a variety of counselling options or parenting discussion groups to help people learn things like anger management.

If the person is not responsive or is someone whom you don't feel you can approach, it is your duty under the Child and Family Service Act to report any suspicion of abuse to Jewish Family and Child Service (which is an authorized provincial children's aid organization) or another children's aid organization. Reporting is, in fact, a legal obligation for those in certain professions such as doctors, teachers, nurses and social workers.

Perhaps most importantly, we should practice positive parenting at home. Every parent should be aware of the difference between discipline and punishment, and that punishments which are punitive or demeaning are not appropriate. Says Kirsh, "When a child does not learn anything about his behavior from a punishment technique, but merely what pleases or displeases a parent, the parent is not helping him to develop socially acceptable behavior, he is just using his power."

Finally, Kirsh feels that education is essential for all parents, whether they have noticeable problems or not. "It is really important for people to know that being a parent is as developmental as being a child. You can learn to be a better parent. Parents need training and education in understanding how to talk to children and meet children's needs. Some people do it naturally, but most of us don't." Certainly, it is a lesson well worth learning.

WOMEN AND LEADERSHIP

BY GERALDINE LUDMERER
President, Jewish Women's Federation

The issue of women and leadership has become a top priority for the Jewish Women's Federation (JWF) which is a department of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (Federation) - the Toronto Jewish community's central communal organization. JWF, which represents 50 Jewish women's volunteer groups and over 20,000 women in the Greater Toronto area, is concerned that there has not been enough growth in terms of senior leadership in the Toronto Jewish community.

The proportion of women in leadership positions in our Federation is commensurate with other large city Federations, according to a recent North-America-wide study undertaken by the Council of Jewish Federations (CJF). The CJF study found that the percentage of women who sit on Federation committees decreases as the city size increases.

In large communities, women make up 27.8% of the total membership of Federation Boards. In the 19 largest Federations the percentage of women Presidents of Federations has dropped since 1986 from 10.5% to 7.0%. And, on the professional side, there are no women Executive Directors in the largest cities.

JWF is currently taking an inventory of the proportion of women participating on all of the committees and boards of the Toronto Federation and its local affiliated agencies. There are presently 47 women out of a total of 153 members of the Executive Board (31%) and 7 women out of a total of 26 Officers (27%).

JWF is approaching the issue of increasing women's participation at leadership levels from a number of directions. The first is to encourage a more accepting environment on the part of our current leadership. We are using every possible opportunity to sensitize current leaders about the need for women to be well represented at leadership levels.

"The fastest growing groups in the fundraising world are women's philanthropic networks"

In recently held discussions around the new By-Laws for the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, JWF helped to ensure that women's issues and voices will be represented at the highest level of Federation governance. When our inventory of women in leadership positions is complete, we will publicize the results to encourage greater participation of women.

Another direction from which this issue needs to be approached is ensuring that there are enough women who have the appropriate background and skills to assume leadership roles in the broader Jewish community. We need to encourage women who have achieved senior leadership roles in women's organizations to continue their involvement in the general Jewish community.

One step that JWF is taking in this area is the creation of a high level Women and Leadership series which will take place this spring, planned together with the Federation's Human Resources Development Department. This six-part series will provide learning opportunities to help women enhance their leadership and financial management skills.

We are also beginning to track women in the Federation system so that we can assist them in "career pathing" and fulfilling their potential in their volunteer careers.

A third direction involves the recognition of different philanthropic patterns of women. At the General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations held in Denver this past November, one session demonstrated that the fastest growing groups in the fundraising world are women's philanthropic networks.

As a result of gains in wage earning and increased education, women are positioned to play a much more active role in philanthropic activity. Studies have shown that women will give generously of their time and charitable dollars to organizations that are inclusive, that make them feel part of the power structure, that fund services which benefit women/families and that give women the opportunity to participate in true positions of leadership.

Therefore, increasing women's involvement will be accomplished by working together with UJA Women's Campaign and the Federation to ensure that as the new Financial Resources Development plan unfolds at the Federation, special women's services and programs are included in the "shopping list" for donors who want to direct some of their funds in this way.

Mideast peace process doomed to failure: Leiter

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —The Mideast peace process willl ultimately fail because it is morally, politically and strategically wrong, the spokesperson of an Israeli settlers' group has forecast.

The prediction was made by Yechiel Leiter, executive director of the foreign desk of the Yesha Council of Communities in Judea, Samaria and Gaza (Yesha).

The umbrella organization claims to represent some 140,000 Jewish inhabitants of the territories.

A resident of the West Bank settlement of Eli, Leiter spoke at a breakfast meeting sponsored by the Institute for International Affairs of B'nai Brith Canada.

In a sweeping condemnation of the Oslo peace process, Leiter said it has divided the Israeli populace, brought an unprecedented surge of terrorism and jeopardized Israel's security.

Accusing the PLO of repeatedly violating the Oslo accord, the 35-year-old American-born settler said the peace process is so "very wrong" it may may yet lead to war.

Paraphrasing U.S. president Thomas Jefferson, Leiter declared that a true peace agreement will remain elusive as long as the process underlying it deeply fragments Israeli public opinion.

Claiming the previous status quo is preferable to the situation today, he called for a national referendum to settle the issue.

An ordained rabbi who served as mayor of Hebron's revitalized Jewish community from 1989 to 1992, Leiter said he yearns for peace every day. "The question is: What kind of a peace are we talking about? There is real peace and false peace."

Categorizing the Oslo process as a "false peace," Leiter said more than 130 Israelis have been killed in terrorist attacks since Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin shook hands with PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat in Washington in September 1993.

He estimated that upwards of 1,500 Israelis would have died in Beersheva recently had Israeli police not intercepted a truck from the Gaza Strip laden with 200 kilograms of explosives.

Yechiel Leiter

Describing Jewish settlements in the West Bank as a barrier to a Palestinian state, he said the settlers there and in Gaza should not be pressured to leave, despite Israeli government efforts to "choke" the settlers through financial means.

He suggested Israel's claim to the territories should be based on its historic and religious connection to these areas. "Why don't we have the gumption to say they're ours?"

Leiter, who is also chair of the One Israel/Yesha Heartland Campaign, said there is no room for a third state between Israel and Jordan.

But he implied that the Palestinians should establish a state in Jordan, with which Israel signed a peace treaty last October.

In addition, he advised Israel to formally annex 58 per cent of the West Bank — eight per cent owned by Jews and 50 per cent classified as state land.

Without naming names, Leiter said there are Palestinian Arabs willing to negotiate with Israel under terms favorable to Israel's interests; but because they fear repercusions from their fellow Palestinians, they do not step forward.

Concluding his remarks, Leiter bemoaned the fact that major Jewish philanthropies in the Diaspora boycott Yesha. This, he said, is "unjust and immoral."

"We deserve humanitarian funding," he said, urging Canadian Jews to channel funds to Jewish settlers in the territories.

Sharon Home planning to expand mandate

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Under the leadership of Daniel Ruth, Winnipeg's Sharon Home is seeking to replace the provincial government as the home care provider for all Winnipeg Jewish seniors in need.

"That is one of the reasons I was brought here," says the new executive vice-president and CEO of the city's only Jewish nursing home.

"We say we are in a better position to know the needs of our constituents and that we can better respond to their health and social service needs than the present system does."

Up to 23 per cent of Winnipeg's Jewish community of 15,000 are over 65.

What Ruth and his board of directors envisage is a "seamless continuous care program" which would provide the necessary home services to delay admittance to the Sharon Home.

Originally from Toronto, Ruth is the youngest son of Sam Ruth, for close to 30 years the CEO of the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

The younger Ruth has worked in hospital and home care administration for the past nine years. Last September, he came to Winnipeg to succeed Dr. Henry Faintuch, the Sharon Home's longtime executive vice-president and CEO.

During his almost 45-year tenure, Faintuch, with wife Sonya, built Winnipeg's Jewish nursing home from a boarding house-type place with 42 elderly residents into a model institution with 234 beds, medical and nursing services, a variety of community services and outreach programs such as adult day care and respite care.

While Ruth praises his predecessor's accomplishments in building one of the finest nursing homes in North America for its size, he says the new focus will be more on people.

"We want to develop programs and services that better meet our clients' needs and we want to encourage families to become more involved in the planning and implementation processes," he says. "We want to make the Sharon Home more inclusive for the community at large."

Ruth says there are plans to make the facility's board and meeting rooms available free of charge to other Jewish community organizations, and he would like to see residents celebrate life cycle events with friends and family in the Home.

He also reports he has been meeting with representatives of other health and social service organizations with an eye to working more closely together for the good of all in these times of limited financial resources.

"The fact that these changes are occurring is not just my doing," he notes. He credits board chair Saul Kanes, president Justice Nathan Nurgitz and the late past president Bill Goldberg for thinking of the future. "The fact that I am here is a testament to them," he says.

The Law of Babysitting

Parents should be particularly concerned with liability for their children in the event of an accident, with or without homeowners' insurance. Without such insurance, they could risk a tremendous lawsuit for damaging a neighbouring dwelling or a child who may be visiting.

Even with a regular homeowners' insurance policy, the policyholder's coverage will normally not extend to his own family members in the event they are personally injured and, moreover, will only cover property damage up to the maximum limit in the policy. If the child starts a fire that burns down neighbouring dwellings, then it is easy to see how even a million collars in coverage could be insufficient in such circumstances.

Frankly, given all the problems and "gray areas" that Canadian law and insurance liability suggest, I am obliged to advise that parents do what may be impractical and financially difficult for many families. I personally feel that the individual must be responsible and ideally no younger than 16 years of age. Moreover, I would be careful that such an individual produce a certificate from a babysitting course. Such courses are offered by local community groups and agencies in major Jewish communities across Canada. I would also wish to be convinced that the babysitter can control younger children, especially in the event of an emergency.

My wife tells me that I will probably receive a lot of hate mail from youngsters between the ages of 11 and 16 as a result of this article. However, since legally the onus is on the parents to show that they made provision for a child's supervision under the age of 16 that is "reasonable in the circumstances", I am admittedly taking a conservative approach to this issue.

Ten-year-old Elizabeth dies of aplastic anemia

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — We can use Elizabeth Herman's name now, because, you see, she died.

Just over two years ago, we wrote about the plucky 8-year-old who needed a bone marrow transplant to combat her aplastic anemia.

Because her parents, Mary Ellen and Michael, wanted her to have as normal a childhood as possible, and also wished to preserve the family's privacy, we called the little girl Cathy.

We talked about how she loved sports, writing stories and playing the piano. And how she would really have loved to go to school regularly.

Mostly we asked you, as we have for others who need bone marrow transplants, to be tested to see if you were a compatible donor for her.

As so often happens in these cases, her siblings, who were a perfect match for each other, could not help her.

On Feb. 17, Liz's time ran out.

Her aunt, Barbara Kaplan, spoke to The CJN on behalf of the family.

Liz, she said, was diagnosed with thrombocytopenia, a congenital bone marrow disorder, soon after she was born. While still a toddler, she developed aplastic anemia, a failure of the bone marrow to produce platelets or red or white blood cells.

This failure, explained Dr. Melvin Freedman, chief of hematology at Hospital for Sick Children and professor of pediatrics at the University of Toronto, who treated Liz, leads to potentially lethal complications. If not cured, the person dies from infection or bleeding.

Transfusions and antibiotics can stem the symptoms of aplastic anemia, but the only cure is a transplant.

Liz had regular transfusions over the years, as well as antibiotic therapy. When a compatible donor was not found, in spite of years of searching Canadian and international bone registries, an unrelated mismatch transplantation was tried last July, in the hope that it would be close enough.

For a few months, the family was hopeful. Liz was allowed to come home for part of each day, which gave her, Kaplan said, a real psychological lift.

Elizabeth Herman

She kept up her love affair with sports, especially baseball. Her last outing was a luncheon with Blue Jays designated hitter Paul Molitor, arranged by the Starlight Foundation, an organization that grants wishes to seriously ill children.

One of the thrills of her life, not to mention the rest of the family, Kaplan admits, was meeting skating star Kurt Browning, who unexpectedly dropped in at a party held the night before Liz went in for her transplant.

The family, which treasures its anonymity, offered to be interviewed "to make people more aware of blood disorders," Kaplan said.

They urge people to donate not just whole blood, but platelets as well.

Judy Burgess, coordinator of special programs in blood donor recruitment for the Red Cross, explains that someone who has given blood three times, can volunteer to be a platelet donor.

When a donor's particular blood type is needed, they are called for a two hour session, during which the blood is removed from one arm into sterile tubing, spun in a centrifuge which spins off the platelets into a bag. The rest of the blood is then returned to the body in the other arm.

The other plea that the family has is obvious: get tested and registered on the international bone marrow registries.

It's too late for Liz, and the Herman family recognizes that. But they desperately hope that other youngsters can be helped. Maybe then her death will have some meaning.

Targeting the silent majority

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — To maintain Jewish continuity, says one expert, we should be targeting the 50 per cent of the Jewish population who are married to Jews but keep a low profile in the community rather than focusing on intermarried couples.

The silent majority "wish to identify as Jews but lack the wherewithal to be able to implement it," said Steven Bayme, adjunct professor at the Wurzweiler School of Social Work of Yeshiva University.

Bayme recently delivered the Ronald Heller Memorial Lecture at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT).

Bayme said we can create a community in which being Jewish is important and tradition more vibrant by enhancing Jewish content.

"Some will buy into that message, others will not," he said.

Bayme said the Jewish community has to offer people compelling reasons for leading Jewish lives other than the Holocaust and the rebirth of Israel. "Our language of identity must be a language of positive joy and affirmation and not simply negative memories of terrible things happening to Jews."

While Jews in North America have achieved success in broader society, he said our inner lives as Jews are weak. "That's our paradox, that by the standards of the external society we are incredibly successful, [but] by the standards of promoting internal Jewish life we seem incredibly inadequate."

He stressed that Jewish continuity programs can work only to the extent that a community stands for something Jewish.

Diamond Centre provides haven for troubled teens

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sarah (not her real name) was raised in a Jewish home. Early on, she fell in with the wrong crowd. Now 18, she says she had a hard time at school and a "scary experience" at home.

It's much the same for "Jeff," 15. He says he had no rules at home and now realizes how disorienting that was. Constant fighting with his mother didn't help.

For "Amy," problems were many. There was physical and verbal abuse, a divorce, and three years ago, at 13, she was diagnosed as having a nervous disorder.

What these three teens have in common — apart from growing up without a "traditional" (read: stable, nurturing) Jewish home — is that they have all found a sanctuary at the Jerome D. Diamond Adolescent Centre, among the Jewish community's better-kept secrets.

Inside a large, airy house on a leafy north Toronto street, the centre, operated by Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS), provides hope for those the community has had a difficult time admitting even exist

Here, up to 18 young people, aged 11 to 18, all with emotional and/or behavioral difficulties, take part in classes approved by the Toronto Board of Education, counselling and therapy sessions and recreational outings — all in a Jewish environment.

Just up the street is the centre's residence, where six boys and girls of the same age live dormitory style. These kids have more serious problems; for one, their families can no longer handle them at home. The kosher residence is staffed round-the-clock.

The idea, says centre manager Gayle Kaye, is to reintegrate clients back into their families and the mainstream by improving peer relationships and acquiring life skills.

"We have children from broken homes, intact homes and some who are wards of the agency," Kaye explains. "They come here because they are having family problems, learning problems and emotional difficulties.

"But here, we stress milieu treatment programming, which means the kids get used to a routine. They have chores, like laundry and cleaning. They have rules, and they are taught to be respectful of others."

The average stay in both the residence and day program is from 1½ to two years. In that time, a team of mental health professionals provides group, family and individual counselling. Classes are from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. All Jewish holidays, including Shabbat, are observed.

Diamond Centre supervisor Brian O'Donnell watches kids bone up on computer skills.

JF&CS's involvement goes back to the turn of the century, when the Jewish Children's Centre on Annette Street was opened in 1905. World War II brought about the Reception Centre for Redeemed Children of the Holocaust, while the Conrad Avenue home was opened in 1962.

By the 1970s, these facilities were termed children's mental health centres, and the Centre Shelanu was opened by JF&CS in 1974.

In 1982, it was renamed the Jerome D. Diamond Adolescent Centre in honor of the man who served as JF&CS executive director for 22 years.

"I love the place," says resident Sarah, who also attends public school classes. "I'm now more patient with my brothers and sisters. You get a lot out of this place. I've learned there are a lot of ways of coping."

Jeff, who also lives in the residence, has learned how to cook and likes being a big brother to his younger sister.

And Amy's mood swings are under control, she's improving at school and is readying herself for a big day this autumn: moving back home.

Giving a 'get' can be a mitzvah: rabbi

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Although the head of Toronto's Beth Din Tzedek encourages estranged couples to restore marital harmony whenever possible, he believes that it can be a mitzvah to give a get (Jewish divorce).

"The Talmud says you can't live with a snake," said Rabbi Mordechai Ochs at a recent seminar on gittin sponsored by Jewish Family & Child Service. Situations leading to divorce include those in which partners are abusive, he said.

The rabbi spoke of the centrality of marriage in Judaism and cautioned that it is important for couples to weigh their options. "Sometimes if one is in a rut, one feels there is no way out except a get."

He usually suggests that couples consult their own rabbi to discuss the possibility of salvaging the marriage. "Unfortunately," he added, "when it comes to us, the marriage is usually beyond repair."

If a marriage is to be dissolved, there is a correct way of doing it, the rabbi emphasized.

Because Jewish laws concerning gittin are so complex, the process requires supervision by a panel of three rabbis, he explained. Two witnesses and a sofer (scribe) are also required.

Rabbi Mordechai Ochs

Specified details include the type of ink, paper and even the writing implement (a turkey quill) required for the document.

A Conservative get will not be universally recognized, the rabbi cautioned.

Either spouse can initiate the get process by contacting the rabbinical court, said Rabbi Ochs.

It is not necessary to provide a ketubah (Jewish marriage contract), although it is preferred. In fact, even the termination of a common-law relationship necessitates a get, said the rabbi.

Without a get, a woman cannot remarry under Jewish law. Should she remarry civilly without obtaining a get, children of the subsequent marriage are considered mamzerim (illegitimate) and may only marry another mamzer or a convert under Jewish law.

A get will not be denied if the parties can't afford to pay for it, said Rabbi Ochs. The ceremony will not even be postponed, he added, although the certificate might be withheld.

A get in Toronto costs $350 if both spouses appear together, or $400 if a proxy is necessary (to stand in place of the husband if they appear separately). The cost includes remuneration for a minimum of six people doing two hours of skilled work, the rabbi noted.

In cases where one spouse is reluctant to agree to the get, rabbinical courts, working in cooperation worldwide, do a lot of behind-the-scenes work, he said.

A recent case involving an agunah (a woman whose husband refuses to give her a get) was resolved locally with the help of an emissary from Jerusalem's rabbinical court. The case had been ongoing for two years.

In another case, the rabbis went to see an incarcerated spouse in jail.

"If one partner keeps the other bound and in anguish, that is a crime," said Rabbi Ochs. "[A recalcitrant husband] is certainly an individual who should be shunned [and] denied any Jewish honors."

To that end, rabbis can issue a seruv regarding anyone who has refused three summonses to appear before the rabbinical courts. The rarely used option is a public document calling on the community to deny the person Jewish honors, such as being called to the Torah.

The seruv "has not proven to be an effective instrument," said Rabbi Ochs.

Canada's Divorce Act, however, has been "of great assistance," Rabbi Ochs said. The act was amended in 1990 to ensure that divorcing spouses remove all barriers to religious remarriage of their partner before obtaining a civil divorce. "Unfortunately, not all lawyers are aware of what the legislation implies," he added.

"We are blessed that we live in a democracy," said the rabbi. "We have to avail ourselves of that which is before us and utilize all methods including public pressure, demonstrations and moral suasion."

Secular Association updates Haggadah

TORONTO — The Secular Jewish Association has updated its Haggadah.

Originally published in 1975, the award-winning trilingual Haggadah (English, Hebrew and Yiddish) reflects the egalitarian philosophy of the secular humanistic Jewish movement.

In keeping with the Passover theme of liberation, the Haggadah includes the story of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising to commemorate the heroism of the Jews who fought for freedom. The birth of the state of Israel and the oppression of Soviet Jewry are also incorporated with the celebration of Passover.

This Haggadah will be available at the association's community seder April 9, at 4:45 p.m. at the York Community Memorial Hall, 5110 Yonge St. For information call 416-463-8909.

Blacks, Jews in shouting match on Shirley

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A shouting match between panel members discussing black-Jewish relations marred the March 23 airing of the Shirley Show on CTV.

Black panelist Hebrew Ben Judah triggered the match between himself and Michael Guzofsky of the Jewish Defence League with his comment that Sephardi Jews made "billions of pounds" from the slave trade.

Only two per cent of the slave trade was in Jewish hands, said Dr. Harold Brackman of the Los Angeles Simon Wiesenthal Centre, but Ben Judah retorted: "That is a falsehood."

Though taped in Toronto, every panelist but one was from the United States. A scheduled representative from the Nation of Islam backed out before the taping three weeks ago.

The talk show is seen weekdays in Canada and the United States.

Host Shirley Solomon said she debated for weeks about whether to do the show, but finally decided that as a Jew she wanted to understand why hatred exists between black and Jews.

The audience of 125, part of which was bussed in from Cleveland, heard one black panel member, Denise Burnett, say she was on "probation" from University of Toronto student radio station CIUT because Jewish people had complained about her allowing two program guests to make statements about Jews involved in the slave trade on her show Caffeine Free.

"My butt was strung up by the Toronto Sun and the Simon Wiesenthal Centre," she charged, after telling a Jewish panel member that as far as the Holocaust was concerned, "You all got money, you got paid."

A panel member identified only as Mr. Star of Black on Black Crime in Cleveland, then said Jews control the media. "The Holocaust is over but Jews are holding the world hostage to it," he said.

A black student from York University, an audience member, said on air he thought the program was slanted against blacks.

Dena Libman, a former York Jewish Student Federation president who attended the taping, told The CJN she was "ashamed" by some of the comments made by Jewish representatives.

Student Eric Benchimal agreed. "I wasn't impressed with the show. It had a bunch of extremists on for the ratings and they didn't represent the blacks or the Jews," he said.

However, there was a positive postscript to the show.

Black and Jewish students at York decided to air the segment in Curtis Hall and follow it with an hour-long exchange of views, which was attended by 70 students.

"There was a lot of finger pointing back and forth, but it's a start," said Benchimal.

"The real issues were not addressed adequately," said Athol Kelly, a member of the Excalibur Black Caucus, who nonetheless was pleased with the turnout.

York black and Jewish students will plant a tree together May 1.

Continuity concerns extend to Israel

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The issue of Jewish continuity in Israel is just as important as it is in North America, the Young Leadership Network of United Jewish Appeal was told recently.

Though many Israelis describe themselves as secular, they are deeply attached to traditional Jewish values, said Michael Wegier of Jerusalem's Melitz Centre for Jewish Education.

Ninety per cent of Israelis fast on Yom Kippur, he said, the main holidays are observed, Friday night dinners are traditional, and if the law did not require it, they would want Orthodox style weddings.

"Secular Israelis don't buy into Orthodox but they still build traditional values into their lives.

Wegier said the issue of intermarriage is a troubling one to Israelis who fear that if Israel is ever accepted as part of the Middle East, and there are open borders, it will face assimilation into the surrounding population of 100 million Arabs.

"The next cultural crunch will be intermarriage," the Israeli educator said. "I'm excited and nervous about it. It's very worrying."

Tammy Axlewicz was chair of the Network's first Perspectives meeting of the new UJA campaign held at Wendy Eisen's home on Warren Road.

PASSOVER FOODS

Lists help you to keep your cool

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

Just the thought of doing all the planning, cleaning, shopping and cooking for Pesach can be daunting.

But it is possible to get through it and still have a functional family, a relationship with your husband and the ability to stand up for more than three minutes at a time.

Now, I am not setting myself up as any kind of expert. My own family will attest to the fact that I am just as hysterical and unreasonable as anyone else, if not more so.

It is just this fact that allows me to give our readers a few pointers to help get through this period.

First of all, make lists. This is one of those suggestions that you see in self-help books (right after "get in touch with your inner self") but for once it is valid.

Make lists about what you should clean first, and what must be kept chometzdik until the last possible minute. Make lists about what parts of the house will hold any remaining chometz — this will save you from, for instance, not being able to find the cute pottery jar that you keep the garlic in for three months after Pesach.

Make lists of what you have to buy, and where you buy it. Modern technology can help here — put it on computer, so that you won't have to figure it all out every year.

Make lists of what you plan to serve, who is coming and where you plan to put them.

Not only does this help you get yourself organized, it ensures that when things really get hectic, you won't forget anything really important. Unless, of course, you lose the list.

This is not the time for misguided economy. If at all possible, get some professional help cleaning. This will enable you to concentrate on remembering where you put the big Passover soup pot.

Don't put off shopping, at least for packaged products, until the last minute. If you hit the stores early, you will get a better selection, find the interesting new foods and not forget the one thing you neglected to put on that list I mentioned.

Now one word of warning. People shopping for Pesach metamorphasize from decent Canadian-type gentlemen and ladies into raging infernos of temper and nastiness.

My husband is still recovering from having a dear little old lady with grey curls and an angelic face ram a shopping cart into his back and smack him, hard, to get a jar of jam he was aiming for.

Explain to your children that the grown-ups didn't really mean to hurt them when they stepped on top of them to get to the soup on the third shelf. It's a good lesson in understanding the unpredictability of human behavior.

Then the cooking. Ah yes. Here's where planning is a must, because no matter how seriously you intend to get your cooking done a week before Pesach, you don't. It helps to know that you can chop four onions, and have enough for the soup, the kugel and the chicken, instead of taking out the chopping board three separate times.

It is tempting to try exotic new recipes on Pesach, but this might not be the best time. In the first place, if it doesn't work out, it's not always possible to send someone out surreptitiously to replace it.

As well, one of the things that makes Pesach special, especially for children, is looking forward to the potato-cheese-sour cream casserole or matzah fruit kugel that you make always and only during these eight days.

And one final suggestion: get the kids involved, even if it takes longer to do everything with them there. The injunction on Pesach is to tell the story of the exodus to your children — and what better way for them to understand the seriousness of the holiday than by taking an active role in preparing for it.

Besides, they do not have to be very old to be a genuine help.

Sometime during chol hamo'ed, make another list — this time recording what you must get next Pesach, such as another cookie sheet, five new glasses, or a new vegetable peeler because you accidentally threw yours out with the garbage. Trust me, you will not remember otherwise, and will find yourself yelling at your husband to run out and get you a new dishpan at midnight.

Most of all, keep cool. After all, if Moses managed to get all those Jews out of Egypt and across the Red Sea in a couple of days, you can surely prepare Pesach for your own family.

Author puts mom's favorites into cookbook

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

When Jan Kliaman's mother, Yetta, died last year, Kliaman wanted to memorialize her in a tangible way.

Yetta Kliaman, Jan says, was "a marvelous cook. She used to make great backyard parties, and prepare so much stuff for holidays."

Relatives and friends asked Jan for her mother's recipes, and she decided to publish My Mother's Cookbook, filled with her mother's favorite recipes as well as some her late aunt, Anne Freedman, was known for, and others that were handed down from past generations.

Unlike many of her generation, Yetta Kliaman had written down her favorite recipes, either in a recipe wheel, or by marking favorite cookbooks.

The only trouble, Kliaman says, is that often there were just ingredients, and she had to guess such factors as exact method or pan size.

"I picked dishes that I remembered, and ones friends asked for," she explained.

She even included her father's salmon patties, made not with bread crumbs, as one usually sees, but with soda crackers.

All the recipes were tested and retested. "My father loved it. There was always lots of food in the house. And when I made a big party, I had lots of great cakes prepared. Of course, they all had one piece cut out — the piece I taste-tested."

Kliaman did all the printing, collating, binding and promotion herself, although she is looking for a publisher.

Yetta Kliaman did not use exotic ingredients or techniques, but "everything always looked terrific, and tasted wonderful."

My Mother's Cookbook is available at $18 from Jansworth Corporation, 416-398-7653.

PASSOVER BROWNIES

5 tbsp. oil
⅔ cup sugar
2 eggs
½ cup cake meal
1 tsp. potato starch
pinch of salt
1 bittersweet chocolate bar - 6 oz.
½ cup chopped nuts

Preheat oven to 350. Lightly grease an 8 x 8 oven-proof glass baking dish.

Melt chocolate. Set aside to cool.

In an electric mixer, cream oil and sugar. Beat in eggs. Add chocolate. Mix in cake meal, potato starch and salt. Stir in nuts. Pour batter into prepared baking dish.

Bake for 20 to 25 minutes.

Cool in baking dish on wire rack. When cool, cut into squares.

BRISKET IN WINE SAUCE

1 brisket, 5 lbs.
1 cup applesauce
1 cup Passover sherry or other wine
1 pkg. onion soup mix
1½ cups orange juice

Preheat oven to 350. Lightly grease a large rectangular baking pan. Place brisket in pan. Blend applesauce, wine, soup mix and orange juice together. Pour mixture over brisket.

Bake uncovered until tender.

SQUASH QUICHE

4 cups squash, peeled, cut into bite-sized pieces, steamed and drained (not too soft)
7 egg whites or 4 whole eggs beaten
1 onion, chopped and sauteed
1 tbsp. butter
1¼ cups cheddar cheese, grated
½ tsp. pepper, or to taste
¼ tsp. salt, or to taste

Preheat oven to 350. Lightly grease an oven-proof utility dish.

Mix together all ingredients. Pour into prepared dish. Bake for 45 minutes.

May be prepared with zucchini or mixed with squash.

Popular Beth Tikvah cookbook is revised for today's cooks

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

It's been nearly 25 years since Beth Tikvah Synagogue sisterhood produced it s very popular All in Good Taste cookbook. Those who have copies treasure them, and carefully hoard them against light-fingered reporters who also collect cookbooks and who consider it a very fine example of the cookbook art indeed.

Well, a sequel has just been published, also called All in Good Taste, with some of the same recipes, but a whole host of new ones, and in tune with today's lighter cooking touch.

Rhona Armel and Heather Shapiro are handling sales and publicity for the cookbook, and talk enthusiastically about the process of preparing it.

In many cases, they say, several generations were involved. People got recipes from their mothers, tested them on their husbands and children, and roped their friends in to taste-test.

"One day when I was testing strudel recipes," recalls Armel, "my husband came home and asked what was for supper, I told him strudel. Because that's all I had time to make that day!"

The whole process, which was coordinated by dietician Marsha Rosen, a past president of Beth Tikvah Sisterhood, took three years.

"Everyone was involved," says Shapiro, not just sisterhood members. "We even got recipes from men in the congregation."

While the original intention was to emphasize "light" cooking, that was not the type of recipes that were coming in. Many were "lightened" for the book, though.

Recipes chosen were, Armel said, "not a patchka. We wanted them to be suitable for newlyweds and for the more sophistocated cook."

All in Good Taste is available through Beth Tikvah Synagogue. Telephone 416-221-3433. Cost is $29.95.

Try these recipes for Passover — they are great.

Recipes suitable for newlyweds

MOCK KISHKE
(Makes 3 rolls)

3 cups matzah meal
1 tsp. salt
½ tsp. pepper
2 large carrots
3 celery stalks
1 Spanish onion
¼-½ cup margarine, melted

Preheat oven to 350.

Combine matzah meal, salt and pepper.

In a food processor, grate carots, celery, and onion and add to matzah meal mixture. Add melted fat and mix thoroughly.

Divide mixture into thirds. Place each on a strip of foil, shiny side up. Shape into a roll and wrap with foil. Secure edges of the roll.

Place on a cookie sheet. Bake 1 hour. Slice into 1½ inch pieces.

HOT VEGETABLE PASSOVER PUDDING

3 cups matzah farfel
3 cups cold water
½ cup oil
2 onions, diced
2 celery stalks, sliced
½ green pepper, julienned
2 carrots, grated
5 eggs, well beaten
½ tsp. white pepper
¾ tsp. salt
2 tbsp. sugar
2 medium potatoes, grated and well drained
1 tbsp. parsley, chopped

Preheat oven to 350.

Using a large bowl, soak farfel in water until soft. Drain well. In a large frying pan, heat 2 tbsp. of the oil and saute onions, carrots, celery and green pepper until the onions are transparent. Pour into a large bowl and mix in all the other ingredients. Mix well.

Place the remaining oil in a 9 x 13 in. pan and place the pan in the oven to heat the oil. Pour the farfel and vegetable mixture into the baking pan. Bake until the top is golden, about 1 hour.

Matzah Free Zone is ideal for meals

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Well, it's almost show time. The main courses are set for the seders (poultry one night, beef the next) and I know exactly what side dishes and desserts I'm serving each night. I always make too much (it's the law) so I know that I'll be serving a lot of leftovers for almost a week. After eating the same food three days in a row, nobody enjoys the meals.

Each year I promise myself that this year will be different. I'll freeze some of leftovers and I will prepare meals that don't revolve around seeing how many different ways I can disguise the leftover turkey.

This column is being declared a Matzah Free Zone. All of the following recipes are 100 per cent matzah-free, yet perfectly fine for serving at any time during Passover. The ingredients are readily available and the time it takes to create them is minimal.

I've tried to provide a wide variety of salads and main courses that will tempt even the kids who are dying for a slice of pizza.

ELEGANT EGGPLANT SALAD
(Serves 6 to 8)

⅓ cup Passover margarine
1 tbsp. lemon juice
½ tsp. dried oregano
2 cloves garlic, minced
1 medium eggplant, peeled, and cut into ½ inch cubes
1 medium onion thinly sliced and separated into rings
1 cup sliced mushrooms
1 medium zucchini, halved and thinly sliced
1 medium tomato, peeled, seeded and chopped
¼ tsp. salt

Combine margarine, lemon juice, oregano and garlic in a large skillet. Cook over moderate heat, stirring occasionally, until garlic is lightly browned. Add eggplant and onion. Stir to coat. Cook, stirring occasionally, about 10 minutes or until eggplant is tender. Remove from heat. Transfer to medium serving bowl. Stir in zucchini, mushrooms, tomato, and salt. Cover and refrigerate at least eight hours or overnight. Stir before serving and you can sprinkle with a little grated cheese if desired. This can be doubled.

TROPICAL CHICKEN SALAD
(Serves 4 to 6)

4 cups cut up chicken (you can use the leftover turkey)
2 large oranges peeled and sectioned (don't save juice)
1½ cup fresh pineapple, cut into chunks. Save shell
1 cup seedless grapes
1 cup chopped celery
¾ cup Passover mayonnaise
3 to 4 tbsp. lemon juice
½ tsp. salt
½ to ¾ cup cashews

In a large bowl, combine chicken, fruit and celery. Mix well. Cover and chill. In a small bowl, combine the remaining ingredients except the nuts. Cover and chill. Just before serving, combine the chicken mixture with the dressing and nuts. Serve in hollowed out pineapple shells (easy clean up) or on lettuce.

CHICKEN WITH PINEAPPLE SALSA
(Serves 4)

1 20 oz. can crushed pineapple
4 boneless, skinless chicken breasts
1 tsp. minced garlic
Salt/pepper to taste
1 tbsp. Passover oil
½ cup diced red pepper
¼ cup diced green pepper
2 tbsp. chopped green onions
2 tsp. minced parsley or cilantro
1 tsp. lime zest

Drain pineapple and save juice. Rub the chicken with the garlic and sprinkle with the salt and pepper. In a skillet, saute the chicken in the oil until browned, turn once. Add ½ cup pineapple juice to chicken. Reduce heat, cover and simmer 7 to 10 minutes. For the salsa, combine pineapple and remaining juice with the remaining ingredients in a medium size bowl. Mix well. Cut each breast into slices and serve it in a fan shape with the salsa on the side. Can be doubled or tripled.

APPLE PECAN CHEESE CAKE
(Serves 8 to 10)

1 8 oz. pkg. cream cheese
1 cup (½ lb.) low fat cottage cheese
½ cup sugar
1 tbsp. potato starch
1 tsp. vanilla
5 eggs
¼ cup ground pecans
½ cup chopped pecans
3 Granny Smith apples, cored, peeled and sliced thin
3 to 4 tbsp. sweet white wine, Passover
2 tbsp. sugar
¼ tsp. cinnamon

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a small spring form pan and dust with the potato starch and ground pecans. Shake out excess and save. In a food processor or blender, blend the cream cheese, cottage cheese, sugar, remaining potato starch/ground pecan mixture and egg yolks together. Pour the mixture into a bowl. Beat egg whites until stiff. Gently fold into cheese mixture, ⅓ at a time. Pour into prepared pan and bake at 350 for 1 hour. Turn off oven; open door and let cool. While cake is cooling, saute the apples, cinnamon and pecans in the white wine until they are slightly soft. Remove from heat and cool. Spoon over cheese cake when serving.

How to survive Pesach without using eggs

By CAROLAN HALPERN
CJN Staff

How do you survive Passover if you can't tolerate eggs? Or if you can only have them in small amounts?

For years I hated Passover food. I hated sponge cake and knaidlach. Matzah was for other people. I wasn't crazy about potatoes. Macaroons always had brown paper stuck to them (I know I am dating myself) and were hard enough to pull the fillings out of your teeth.

Then one year, well into adulthood, I had a massive debilitating migraine towards the end of Pesach.

I ultimately isolated a number of foods that set off my migraines and discovered they were common triggers — chocolate, red wine, sharp cheeses. And, in my case, eggs.

Then came Pesach again. A quick scan of the Passover section of any kosher cookbook shows three to 12 eggs in almost every recipe.

In theory, I should have lost weight every Pesach, but I was not so lucky. I adjusted by using cheese and yogurt for lunch and munching nuts and potato chips. I also learned to like matzah if I put enough butter on it. No eggs but lots of fat!

My other adjustment was more sensible. At the beginning of Passover, I make a large pot of pareve vegetable soup thickened with potato starch and a little margarine and freeze it in portions to use when I start feeling guilty about all the fat.

This year, the doctor has me watching cholesterol, so life will be even more interesting.

I have always eaten so much cheese that I figure I must have been a rat in an earlier life, and my Passover diet was not, on the whole, a deprivation.

But I did feel deprived when it came time for dessert and everybody else was eating the cakes — and all that chocolate.

So I started to experiment with the recipes I was using for chometz. Some of the adaptations produced rather strange looking results (like my attempt to make my son something he would accept as bran muffins, but that's a whole other story). Only once over many years, however, have my substitutions produced something totally inedible.

And I have discovered that some of the traditional dishes are just as good with fewer eggs than the recipes indicate. I now use ⅓ the number of eggs called for in all kugel recipes and none at all in the turkey stuffing, and I still get compliments. Of course, that could be hunger talking; dinner is never exactly early on seder nights.

Among my more successful endeavors to produce desserts with few or no eggs are my Passover cookies. The first time I tried them, I made the mistake of leaving them on a low table to cool and the kids got most of them before I did.

When they asked for more, I knew I had a winner.

Here are two recipes that have worked well.

PASSOVER COOKIES
(Makes about 1½ dozen)

1 egg
⅓ cup oil
½ cup sugar
½ pear or apple grated or ¼ cup fruit juice
1/8 tsp. cinnamon (omit if using orange juice)
¾ tsp. Passover baking soda
1 cup cake meal
½ cup chopped nuts (less if they are very finely chopped)
¼ cup raisins

In a large bowl, beat egg slightly. Add oil, sugar, cinnamon, grated fruit or juice. Mix well.

Add baking soda, cake meal, nuts and raisins one at a time, mixing after each addition.

Drop by teaspoonfuls on cookie sheet. Bake at 350 for 10 to 12 minutes.

APPLE CRISP

6 apples pared and sliced
½ cup sugar
½ tsp. cinnamon
2 tsp. lemon juice

Toss ingredients gently and place in a baking dish.

Topping

½ cup sugar
¾ cup cake meal
1/8 tsp. salt
6 tbsp. pareve margarine
¼ cup chopped nuts

The gourmet touch for Passover

By NAOMI ARBIT
Special to The CJN

Passover is a time for family memories. The heirloom kiddush cup from grandmother and grandfather's wedding is used only at our seders. We were delighted to receive a seder plate as one of our wedding gifts. And we have wonderful memories of our first trip to Israel when we use the beautifully embroidered matzah cover.

But each year brings new traditions and new adventures to our dinner table, which, along with the old favorites, make us look forward to each Passover.

Gefilte Fish in a Loaf

2 medium whole carrots, peeled and cooked until tender
2 pounds whitefish fillets
2 medium onions, chopped
1 carrot, grated
1/2 cup matzah meal
1 tsp. vegetable oil
1 whole egg
2 egg whites
1 teaspoon sugar
salt and white pepper to taste
1/2 tsp. nutmeg
1/2 cup cold water

Grind fish and onion in a food processor. Combine mixture with the grated carrot, matzah meal, oil, sugar, salt and pepper, eggs and cold water.

Place half of the mixture in a non-stick or lightly oiled 9 x 5 inch loaf pan. Arrange the 3 carrots lengthwise on top of the mixture. Cover with the remaining mixture. Bake at 350 degrees for an hour. Do not let it brown. Cool in pan. Turn it out and refrigerate it covered. Slice and serve with horseradish.

Makes 6-8 servings.

Carrot Casserole

1 pound carrots, cleaned and sliced
2 tbsp. potato starch
1/4 cup margarine
3 large eggs
1 cup Passover non-dairy creamer
1 1/2 tsp. cinnamon

Cook carrots in boiling water 8-10 minutes or until tender; drain. In a food processor, using the steel blade, process carrots for 20 seconds. Add remaining ingredients and process until smooth.

Pour mixture into a non-stick sprayed oven casserole dish. Cover and bake at 350 degrees for 20 minutes. Remove cover and bake 20-25 minutes longer.

Makes 8 servings.

Stuffed Veal Breast

1 large veal breast (about 6 lbs.), ask butcher to cut pocket
1 clove garlic
salt and pepper to taste

2 tablespoons olive oil
3 ribs celery, coarsely chopped
1 medium onion, chopped
3 carrots, cut into 1-inch chunks (divided)
1 1/2 cups dry kosher for Passover white wine, divided
1/2 red pepper, cut into julienne
1/2 green pepper, cut into julienne
1/2 pound mushrooms, quartered or halved

Rub veal breast with garlic and lightly season with salt and pepper. Prepare stuffing. Fill pocket of veal breast with stuffing. Secure opening with skewers.

In large, heavy kettle or Dutch oven, heat olive oil over medium-high heat. Add breast and brown well on both sides. Remove breast and spread celery, chopped onion and 1/3 of the carrots over the bottom of the pan. Return veal to pan over the vegetables. Pour 1 cup of the wine over the top.

Cook, uncovered, until wine starts to boil and steam. Add remaining 1/2 cup wine. Cover and simmer over very low heat about 2 hours or until tender. Uncover and add remaining carrot chunks and mushrooms. Cover and cook 20 minutes longer until carrots are tender. Uncover, add green and red peppers. Cover and cook 15 minutes longer.

Remove the breast, slice into ribs and transfer to a warm serving platter with the vegetables. Spoon a small amount of sauce over meat.

Stuffing:

4 cups matzah farfel
1 cup orange juice
1/4 cup olive oil
1 clove garlic, minced
3/4 cup chopped onion
1/2 cup chopped celery
1/2 cup chopped red pepper
1 egg

In a large bowl, soak farfel in orange juice. In a skillet, heat oil. Saute onion, celery, garlic and red pepper until soft. Add these vegetables to farfel. Stir in egg and salt and pepper to taste. Mix well.

Makes 4 servings.

Chocolate Almond Torte

1 1/4 cups sugar
1 cup margarine, softened
4 eggs, separated
2 1/4 cups sliced blanched almonds
7 squares unsweetened chocolate

Line bottom of a 9-inch greased springform pan with parchment paper. Grease paper.

In an electric mixer, beat together sugar and margarine until fluffy. Blend in egg yolks. In a food processor, process almonds and chocolate until finely ground. Stir into batter. Beat egg whites until they hold soft peaks. Gently fold into batter.

Spread batter into prepared pan, smoothing the top. Bake about 1½ hours at 300° or until top springs back when touched with finger. Cool cake for 10 minutes. Turn cake over, remove paper and cool completely. Serve with whipped topping or strawberry sauce.

Strawberry Sauce:

2 cups unsweetened frozen strawberries, thawed
1/2 cup sugar

Puree strawberries and sugar in a blender. In a small saucepan simmer mixture 3 minutes. Cover and cool.

To serve, spoon strawberry sauce onto plate, place slice of torte and top with a fresh strawberry.

Non-Fat Breakfast Pancakes

2 pieces of matzah, broken up
2 egg whites, beaten
1/2 Granny Smith apple, chopped
1 tbsp. sugar
1/8 tsp. cinnamon

Soak matzah in boiling water until softened. Squeeze dry.

In a mixing bowl, combine egg whites with apple, sugar and cinnamon and mix well. Stir in matzah.

Form into 6 pancakes and place in a non-stick sprayed skillet. Brown pancakes on both sides. Serve with honey, preserves or syrup.

Kashruth Council provides COR holiday information

The Kosher Information Service of the Kashruth Council of Toronto, affiliated with the Vaad Harabonim of Toronto, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and the Canadian Jewish Congress, publishes a COR holiday information and recipe pamphlet for each major holiday.

As a service to the community, the Kashruth Council provides kashruth and food related information to thousands of families across Canada, the United States and as far as Israel and Europe, says Rabbi Mordechai Levin, the council's executive director.

If you wish to be placed on the COR mailing list, call the Kashruth Council 416-635-9550, or write to 4600 Bathurst St., Suite 240, Willowdale, Ont. M2R 3V2.

Esther Schwartz, the council's kosher food consultant, prepares and tests the recipes. The recipes for Passover 1995-5755 include avocado spread or dip, matzo meal coated fish, light tasty fruit farfel kugel, sweet potato casserole, white grape juice sorbet, meringue cookies, and light, fluffy Passover pancakes.

Here is a sample from this year's Passover flyer.

Combine crumb mixture and sprinkle over top. Cover casserole and bake at 350F for 30-40 minutes removing cover the last 15 minutes.

BJC TAKES PASSOVER TO CAMP

Passover may celebrate Jewish freedom, but children are often left with little to do after the seders. That's why the Bathurst Jewish Centre has developed a day camp experience for the holiday. The camp will run from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. April 17-20. The camp is available to children 4-12 years old. For additional information, call (416) 636-1880, ext. 378.

Useable Passover products

Based on information provided to our office by various companies kind enough to respond to our inquiries, the Kashruth Council has been able to prepare a list of items that may be used on Passover. As we have not supervised nor seen the actual production of these products, we can assume no responsibility for the accuracy of the information.

Everything ingested during Passover should bear a Passover endorsement. If "kosher for Passover" products are not available and there is a medical need, the items listed below do not contain chometz and should be used in separate utensils. Consult your rabbi for further guidance.

Generally, when taking medication during Passover, preference should be given to non-chewable tablets rather than liquids and chewable tablets.

This is only a partial list. For a complete listing, call the Kashruth Council at 416-635-9550.

Milk Enzyme: Lactaid Drops — bearing a COR. It is necessary to prepare the milk before Passover. Use separate utensils. Lactaid tablets should not be used on Passover.

Infant Formula (Kitnyos): All infant formulas listed below should be used in separate utensils. Formula is available in liquid and powder. Check each container for a hechsher, since not all forms are kosher endorsed. Alactamil, Enfalac, Isomil, Prosobee, Similac.

Nutritional Supplements (Kitnyos): These products are not produced under Passover supervision. They should be used only when there is no alternative. A rabbi should be consuled. Boost; Koscal; Ensure; Essential.

Oral Care: Kosher for Passover toothpaste is recommended. When not available, the following toothpastes may be used: Crest Regular and Colgate Regular; Johnson & Johnson Dental Floss (unflavored); Polident; Poli-grip, Corega, Fasteeth; Listerine: Regular and Coolmint.

Aluminum Products: Special Passover certification is not required; any brand bearing kosher endorsement may be used.

Paper Products: Plates: Use plastic or styrofoam only. Parchment Paper: Peterson/Norscan Silicone Paper; McNairn Packaging Silicone Paper.

Some napkins and paper towels may contain starch. Since we cannot get accurate information as to which paper goods are absolutely free from starch content, we suggest that they not come in contact with wet foods, i.e. latkes.

Miscellaneous Baby Products: Johnson's Baby Lotion, Johnson's Baby Lotion with Baby Oil; Johnson's Baby Oil; Johnson's Baby Shampoo; Johnson's Baby Powder (cornstarch and talcum); Johnson's Baby Body Wash; Baby Fresh Wipes (by Scott).

Deodorants: Mitchum and Lady Mitchum roll-on and stick.

Fragrance: Revlon Fire and Ice Fragrance.

Skin Care: Almay Time-Off Toner; Almay Time-Off Moisture Lotion; Almay Time-Off Cleanser; Revlon Results Day-Light Replenisher Moisture Lotion/Moisturizer Oil-Free Fluid; Moon Drops Lightweight/Nourishing/Soothing Moisture Lotion.

Shampoo: Johnson's Baby Shampoo.

Oven Cleaner: Any brand.

General Guidelines:

- Brown sugar and icing sugar should be used only with Passover supervision.
- Cosmetics, toiletries, soap, topical medications, which are in solid form or are thick creams, ointments and salves, may be used (preferably without perfume). Please consult your rabbi about wheat and oat based soaps.
- The following items, which are not fit for human consumption (preferably unscented, when applicable) are permissible on Passover (excluding Sabbath and Yom Tov): Nail Polish, hand lotion, hand cream, cold cream, unscented baby lotion, baby cream, shampoo (without wheat), shoe polish, ink, paint, solid air freshener, nail polish remover, stick deodorants, eye shadow, eyeliner, mascara, blush and rouge, non-flavored new lipsticks.
- Balloons and rubber gloves may have starches inside.

The above information pertains to Canadian products only for 1995.

Negev Dinner 'love-in' raises $120,000

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — A record crowd attended the recent third Victoria Negev Dinner, raising $120,000 for the Victoria groves in the B.C. Forest in Israel.

More than 325 people attended the dinner honoring Mel Cooper, a non-Jewish radio station owner and one of British Columbia's most prominent businessmen.

Jewish National Fund (JNF) branch president April Katz said the majority of the crowd came from the larger community.

A pleasant touch was Floralove Katz, a friend of the honoree, who came specially from Ottawa to serenade Cooper with Jewish songs.

Israeli ambasador to the United Nations, Gad Yaacobi, spoke about the dawning of peace in the Middle East.

He reported that Israel now has relations with 155 of the 175 countries in the United Nations.

The ambassador's speech was the only serious part of the evening's program, which soon developed into a love-in for the honoree.

Victoria and Vancouver broadcast personalities paid tribute to Cooper, a former Newfoundlander, and "Newfie" jokes abounded.

Emcee Peter Legge said, "Mel gives back to the community time after time. It's impossible for him to say no."

Stephanie Gilbert, co-chair of the event with David Katz, thanked Cooper for his "loving kindness." She presented him with a silver kiddush cup. Mel Kottler, JNF chair for small communities, presented him with a plaque.

Cooper called it an "extraordinary evening" and thanked the JNF for the honor in picking him.

Seen at the Victoria Negev Dinner (from left) is Ambassador Gad Yaacobi, co-chairs David Katz and Stephanie Gilbert and honoree Mel Cooper.

Gymnast wins gold at Canada Winter Games

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Whether Justin Gerson's glass was half full or half empty following the recent Canada Winter Games depends on your perspective.

When the 17-year-old gymnast returned home from Red Deer recently, he had with him a gold medal and a flag of the Games, which he had obtained through unofficial channels by clambering up a flag pole as only a gymnast can do. Too bad there wasn't an event for flagpole climbing.

A gold medal and participation in an elite competition helped fill up his glass, at least partially, but he was a little disappointed — he had gone to the Games hoping to finish in the top six allround and perhaps snag two or three individual medals as well.

Gerson's gold came by the narrowest of margins, as Team Ontario edged out Team Quebec by .8 of a point.

Justin, having finished among the top four for Ontario in the team event, went on to further competition in individual events.

Unfortunately he came up just short of a medal in rings, finishing fourth, and followed that up with a sixth place showing in the parallel bars.

In the allround event, which includes parallel bars, rings, floor exercises, vault, pommel horse and high bar, Gerson had an off-day and finished 11th.

"He went for it," his father, Peter, said of the parallel bars competition. "He tried to do extras. He added extra hard moves to his routine to try to [score higher] and he didn't stick on the landing because he was tired."

Considering that Gerson considers rings, pommel and vault his best events, he can't be too disappointed by the parallel bars showing.

A native of South Africa who emigrated to Canada with his family at age 2, Gerson has been doing gymnastics for the past eight years.

"My parents put me in for recreational sport," he said. "I started off in Winstonette (a gymnastics club) in Markham."

Training once a week for an hour-and-a-half, he made steady progress. From age 10 to 15, already showing promise, Gerson worked out at the York University Gymnastics Club, where Curtis Hibert, one of Canada's best gymnasts ever, trained.

Hibert was a real inspiration, Gerson said, and he tried to pattern himself after him. "I'm into the power side of gymnastics," the five-foot-nine, 140-lb. athlete said.

Two years ago, Gerson joined Vaughan Gymnastics where he trains under the supervision of coaches Bob Carisse and Hiroshi Shimozoki. He said he's noticed a lot of improvement since making the move.

In 1993, Gerson managed a sixth place finish in the allround event at the Canadian championships and in 1994 he upped that to second.

In the months leading up to the Winter Games, Gerson was in the gym six days a week, training for four hours at a time.

The Canada Winter Games were his second shot at a multi-sport event. In 1993, he competed at the Maccabiah Games in Israel, winning a gold in vault and a bronze in rings to go with his seventh place finish overall. Better yet, he came home with a souvenir flag from that competition as well.

Gerson already has his sights set on the Canadian nationals in May, which will be held in Vancouver, and eventually he's hoping to land an athletic scholarship at a Canadian or U.S. university.

For Gerson, the sky's the limit when it comes to gymnastics. He believes a spot on the national team in the world championships and perhaps the 2000 Olympics is well within his grasp. And besides, the five-ringed flag would make a dandy addition to his burgeoning trophy mantelpiece.

Strength and control are key elements for an elite gymnast, as Justin Gerson demonstrates.

Israeli juniors rack up respectable 2-2 record

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For Jason Goldberg and Yaron Orgil, participating in a recent international hockey tournament in Lithuania was the greatest experience of their lives.

Wearing Israel's colors and hearing Hatikvah played after an unexpected victory over Bulgaria brought tears to their eyes, the two young skaters said.

"It wasn't just playing a game you love, it was something from your heart, playing for your country," Goldberg said.

The 5-2 win over Bulgaria was the culmination of a two-month experience that began with tryouts for Israel's first-ever national junior team.

Along with nine other Toronto-based hockey players, Goldberg and Orgil were selected to bolster Israel's fledgling entry into world junior hockey and give it some instant credibility.

Team played physical brand of hockey

They did just that, leading Israel to a 2-2 record — the same result as the bronze-winning Netherlands team.

Host team Lithuania, a powerhouse compared to the opposition, captured the gold, while Croatia snagged the silver in the International Ice Hockey Federation tournament.

Despite its 2-2 record, Israel finished fifth behind 1-3 Yugoslavia. Participants were hard pressed to explain the anomalous result, saying they believed it was due to the divisional format of the competition.

Still, tied with the third-best record among six teams, Israel did itself proud at the games.

The 10 Canadian-based skaters, all of whom had either an Israeli passport or whose parents were born in the Jewish state, met their Israeli counterparts at a training camp prior to the tournament. Coaches Mike Rubin, an oleh from Toronto, and Mark Talesnick, a native of Kingston, Ont., threw the boys together to ensure development of good team chemistry, said Yaron's father Moti Orgil, who served as the team's equipment manager.

A second exhibition game also brought the team closer together. Against a bolstered Lithuanian national team, Israel came out playing Canadian-style hockey, hitting at every turn. With the score 4-2 for Lithuania towards the end of the second period, tempers flared and an on-ice brawl took place, with one Lithuanian leaving the penalty box to participate. The coaches of both teams met and decided to cancel the rest of the game.

Despite the result, the newspapers the next day reported that Israel would not be the pushovers that had been expected, Goldberg said.

"We played Canadian-style throughout the tournament," said Goldberg. "European hockey is all stickwork, hooking, holding and slashing. It's really frustrating."

Orgil, who plays Midget A hockey with Thornhill Islanders, said the European referees didn't penalize the stickwork, while solid bodychecks were called as charging.

Game 1 of the tournament pitted Israel against the host Lithuanians. Riki Goldberg, Jason's mother, said about 3,000 cheering Lithuanian fans overflowed the arena.

Jason said that while Israel played tough early in the game and held the Lithuanians scoreless, they were just too good and eventually pulled away, winning 14-2. "They were faster than us and their passing was stronger. But we knocked them off the puck."

Game 2 the next day saw Israel face off against Croatia. The Israelis, drained from their contest against Lithuania, lost 9-0.

Ran Oz named tournament's all-star defenceman

After a two-day rest, game 3 was against Turkey, the tournament's weak sister, and Israel poured it on, beating them 15-1.

Game 4 was against Bulgaria, a team many Israelis knew would be hard to beat. But the boys in blue and white played their hearts out and the score was 2-2 after two. In the third, Israel scored a couple of goals to break the game wide open and added an insurance marker to make the final 5-2.

"Even though we were out of the medal round, we went ballistic. We heard Hatikvah and it meant something. We worked hard for that one," Goldberg said.

Team captain Ran Oz, a big defenceman who plays with Toronto's Midget Marlies, was named the tournament's all-star defenceman.

When they weren't playing hockey, the boys met with members of the Lithuanian Jewish community, which numbers about 6,000.

They also toured the wartime Jewish ghetto and visited Fort 9 where Jews were murdered during the Holocaust.

With the tournament over, the boys went their separate ways with memories, they say, that will last a lifetime.

Hamas bomb factory explodes in Gaza

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — A massive blast in a Gaza apartment block last Sunday afternoon killed nine people and wounded 30, including one of the top militants on Israel's most-wanted list.

The blast, triggered when a bomb being prepared by extremists went off, claimed at least four members of Hamas, including Kamal Ismail Hafez Kahil, the 32-year-old leader of Izzedine al-Qassam, Hamas' military wing.

Kahil was among Israel's most-wanted Islamic militants. He was blamed for the December 1993 ambush that killed Lt.-Col. Meir Mintz, the highest-ranking Israeli soldier to die in Gaza.

PLO leader Yasser Arafat responded angrily to the explosion and ordered a round-up of Hamas members.

Palestinian police who searched the ruins of the apartment in the Sheikh Radwan neighborhood of Gaza City found 150 unexploded grenades, a large quantity of chemicals, several pistols, an Uzi machinegun and three Kalashnikov assault rifles, Gaza police chief Brig. Ghazi Jabali told a news conference.

There were also backpacks for use by suicide bombers and letters documenting plans for future attacks against Israelis.

The explosion destroyed the second floor of the three-story building, throwing debris into the floor above. Among the dead was a five-year-old boy and his father, who lived on the third floor.

Hamas blamed both Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA) for the blast.

It issued a leaflet saying, "We hold the Palestinian Authority and the Zionist enemy and their collaborators completely responsible for this criminal act. It is a new massacre by the Palestinian Authority."

The Israel Defence Force had no comment, saying the explosion happened in PA-controlled territory.

Islamic militant wanted by security services

But Shlomo Kostiner, secretary of the Jewish settlement of Netzarim, said, "We should be happy about this situation ... It's good that terrorists were killed before they succeeded in harming Israelis."

Jabali described the building's second floor as a Hamas bomb factory and operations room.

Many Gazans inhaled noxious gas created when leaking water pipes mixed with chemicals. Twelve policemen were hospitalized for gas inhalation, a senior security police source said.

Kahil is also believed to have killed several Palestinians, most recently three months ago, when he allegedly forced Jabalaya residents to bury the body of a man he had shot.

Since then, he was wanted by the Palestinian as well as by Israeli security services.

Last week, Kahil was said to have narrowly evaded capture by the Palestinian Police in the Shati refugee camp, when he threatened to detonate a belt of grenades and blow himself up if police approached.

Talks with Syria continue despite Hezbollah attacks

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — As life returned to normal for residents of northern Israel in the wake of last Friday's rocket attacks launched by Hezbollah extremists, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin said the only solution to fight terrorists is a political one.

Rabin told the weekly cabinet meeting Sunday that despite the attacks, negotiations with Syria would continue.

He and other government officials have repeatedly blamed Syria, the major power broker in Lebanon, for not doing enough to stop Hezbollah in southern Lebanon.

Meanwhile, the two Israelis killed last Friday were buried in their home towns.

Staff Sgt. Liron Lang, 20, was buried in Kibbutz Givat Haim Ihud, near Hadera.

Benny Yunassi, 17, was buried in Nahariya. Yunassi was killed by a Katyusha rocket last Friday evening while jogging on the beach.

The rocket was one of some 30 to 40 fired by terrorists from the Tyre and Nabatiya areas in Lebanon. Twelve landed in Israel.

The attacks came in response to an Israeli precision air strike in southern Lebanon earlier Friday. The strike killed a senior Hezbollah leader, Rida Mahsoun Yassin, also known as Abu Alli.

Two Israeli attack helicopters fired rockets at the car in which Yassin was travelling, killing him and two others.

Hours later, the first Hezbollah salvos landed near the northern towns of Kiryat Shmona and Nahariya a little after 6 p.m. Other rockets fell in the Galilee region an hour later.

Nine people were treated for injuries and shock. There was also damage to apartment buildings.

The government sent assessors and service crews to hard-hit areas to estimate damage and begin repair work.

Israel's northern border was quiet over the weekend, after U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher reportedly appealed to Syria and Lebanon to calm the situation.

Israeli diplomatic sources in Washington said Christopher met over the weekend with Israel's ambassador to Washington, Itamar Rabinovich, who said Israel stands by the agreements reached with Hezbollah in July 1993.

According to that understanding, Israel agreed not to shell civilian targets and Hezbollah vowed not to shell targets in northern Israel.

The sources said Christopher passed on Rabinovich's message during telephone conversations with the foreign ministers of Syria and Lebanon.

Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk al-Sharaa assured Christopher that Syria also stands by the agreements, adding that his country viewed last Friday's rocket assaults by Hezbollah as an aberration.

Russian foreign minister relays Assad message

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Syrian President Hafez al-Assad is serious about peace with Israel, but the price is full withdrawal from the Golan Heights, Russian Foreign Minister Andrei Kozyrev told Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin last Sunday.

Kozyrev, on a swing through the Middle East, held talks last week with officials in Damascus.

In his talks with Kozyrev, Rabin expressed dissatisfaction with Russia's plans to build a nuclear reactor for Iran.

In a statement issued by Rabin's office after the meeting, the prime minister is said to have told Kozyrev that "Russia's ties with Iran are not to Israel's liking."

Earlier in the day, Kozyrev defended Russia's sale of nuclear technology to Iran in the face of American and Israeli opposition. "Our nuclear cooperation with Iran is under international supervision," he added.

Kozyrev also provided Rabin with an unspecified personal letter from Russian President Boris Yeltsin, and there was speculation there was one from Assad as well.

Earlier in the day, Kozyrev visited Yad Vashem, where he expressed repugnance for Nazi brutality, telling reporters there is nothing "as disgusting" as anti-Semitism.

He said the tour of the site had given him new strength to face an upcoming court case against Russian right-wing politician Vladimir Zhirinovsky.

Jewish Agency's future debated

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — "Ever since the founding of the State of Israel, the relationship between Israel and the Jews in the Diaspora has been one-sided ... Israel dictated the joint agenda, placed its material needs at the core, and demonstrated an arrogance based on the assumption, 'You owe us.' "

This part of the unflattering portrait of Israel-Diaspora relations painted by two Israeli academics: Prof. Haim Ben-Shahar, former president of Tel Aviv University, and Dr. Arye Carmon, president of the Israel Democracy Institute.

Their critique and their recipe for reforging the relationship is the basis of The Jerusalem Plan — 1997, which strives to "reformulate the role of Zionism" on the eve of the movement's centennial.

The recently published document, which calls for dismantling much of the Jewish Agency, has reportedly intrigued newly appointed Jewish Agency president Avraham Burg, who asked to participate in an upcoming workshop on the plan, according to Carmon.

Burg is probably more interested in their ideas for promoting Jewish education than in the call for revamping the Jewish Agency, acknowledges Carmon. "But his interest is encouraging."

The premise of the report is that the traditional basis for solidarity between Israel and the Diaspora — the physical survival of Israel — is losing its relevance.

Moreover, Israel is no longer a country in need, but an economic success story. The money raised by Diaspora Jews through the United Jewish Appeal and the United Israel Appeal — which forms the Jewish Agency budget — was only 0.65 per cent of Israel's gross domestic product in 1994, they note.

Finally, Israel must abandon its attitude of "negating the Diaspora," and accept the fact that "significant parts of the Jewish nation will continue to live outside Israel. Israel is not and cannot be the sole centre for Jewish creativity," says the report. At the same time, there is a need to combat cultural assimilation in the Diaspora.

The solution? Make culture, not fear for Israel's physical or economic survival, the foundation of a new relationship between Israel and Diaspora Jewry.

The authors propose programs to promote cultural links, such as a Jewish university that would broadcast courses on television in different languages; a centre for development of Jewish educational software, with branches in Jerusalem, Los Angeles, Paris and other cities; and video conferences for international Jewish leaders. The idea is to exploit the global communications revolution in order to close the cultural and geographic gap between Israel and the Diaspora.

Acknowledging that "aliyah in the classic sense has never been attractive to most Jews living in free countries," the authors propose a "scale of aliyah, whose apex is living in Israel, but whose lower rungs are also legitimate expressions of commitment to the nation and participation in its life." These forms of "partial aliyah" could include living part-time, working, studying or conducting business in Israel, without necessarily cutting off links with one's home country.

Probably the most controversial part of the report is its proposal for dismantling much of the Jewish Agency apparatus. The authors argue that many of the organization's current functions could be better carried out by the Israeli government.

The Agency's budget ($490 million in 1994) is spread over too many areas, thus diminishing its ability to leave an imprint on Israeli society, argue the authors. Instead this money should be redirected almost exclusively toward Jewish cultural activities in Israel and the Diaspora.

Staff should be scaled down

The staff should be scaled down to a few dozen workers who would allocate funding to other bodies to implement educational programs.

The agency's only immigration activity should be facilitating the aliyah of Jews from countries in distress. There is no need for emissaries in free countries, argue the authors. Moreover, Israeli and Diaspora Jews should contribute equally to the Jewish Agency's budget, in order to form "a true partnership."

When Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin suggested last year that Israel no longer needs Jewish philanthropy, he received a tongue lashing from Israeli and Diaspora leaders.

Carmon says Beilin erred in the way he presented his viewpoint. "As an Israeli, I would like to become part of a world Jewish treasury that would determine priorities. I would be subject to a Jewish taxation just like other Jews. And my money would go to fund a home for elderly Jews in Montreal or to Jewish education in Calgary — if this is the priority determined by the Jewish Agency."

Carmon adds that Beilin, "who was aggressive in his approach," has since come up with more constructive proposals that "are worth serious consideration."

The Jewish Plan has received very little feedback in Israel, but Carmon maintains that is because it has not yet been widely disseminated.

Within a few months, the Israel Democracy Institute will hold a workshop with Jewish leaders from all over the world to debate the program and explore ways of implementing it, he says.

The Week in Israel

March 27:

• Maariv reported Syria has decided to change its policy on terrorist organizations operating inside the country. Quoting a U.S. document, the paper stated terrorist organizations now fear Syrian sponsorship will end soon.

• Morocco officially opened its diplomatic mission on Tel Aviv's Weizmann Street. It is the third Arab diplomatic bureau to open in Israel.

March 28:

• The ministerial committee for privatization, headed by Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, decided to dismantle the state-owned Israel Shipyards, based in Haifa. The Histadrut was highly critical of the decision and promised to organize workers throughout Haifa to turn back the decision.

March 29:

• Ha'aretz reported that Foreign Minister Shimon Peres told the Knesset's foreign affairs and defence committee he had made it clear to PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat that Israel has no intention of compromising on the issue of Jerusalem. "The issue of Jerusalem was closed politically but open religiously," Peres said.

• The Israeli satellite developed by the Technion and launched into space by a Russian rocket crashed into the sea shortly after takeoff. The satellite took three years to develop and cost $3.5 million.

March 30:

• Russian Foreign Minister Andrei Kozyrev arrived in Damascus from Cairo to meet with his Syrian counterpart. Kozyrev will also be meeting with the governments of Lebanon and Israel. Ha'aretz reported that Rabin will raise the issue of Russia's recent sale of nuclear reactors to Iran when he meets with Kozyrev.

March 31:

• At a memorial service for Yigal Allon at Kibbutz Ginossar, Deputy IDF Chief of Staff Matan Vilna'i stated that in the month of March, terrorist forces had launched 50 separate assaults against the IDF and the South Lebanon Army in the security corridor of South Lebanon. This was the highest monthly figure of such attacks in 10 years.

April 1

• Seventy years ago the Hebrew University of Jerusalem was founded.

for his wartime activities, admitted involvement in two separate executions in 1941.

In documents filed in Federal Court, Immigration authorities allege that Tobiass volunteered to serve in the Latvian Auxiliary Security Police, also known as the Arajs Kommando, and later in the German Waffen SS.

The police unit "participated in the arrests and executions of civilians, including Jews, Communists and psychiatric patients...[from] July 1941 to the fall of 1941 and again in the spring and summer of 1942" outside Riga, the document states.

Tobiass "admitted that during the summer of 1941 he was involved in an active capacity in two separate executions carried out by the Latvian Auxiliary Security Police," the document continues.

Unit allged to have shot over 1,450 people

From February to March 1943, Tobiass allegedly served as a driver in Commando A of the police unit. During that time, the unit is alleged to have shot over 1450 people, including the elderly, and burned down 31 villages.

Tobiass' membership in the police and SS units and his participation in mass executions of civilians would have disqualified him from admission to Canada and from obtaining citizenship, federal authorities argue.

Abella said that while the government is finally taking some action against Tobiass, Congress believes "there is enough evidence to justify a criminal prosecution. Here's a man who admitted taking part in executions. He's a member of a gang that murdered tens of thousands of people and razed villages. If a man like that is not tried, we might as well forget the criminal route entirely."

If Tobiass is successfully stripped of his citizenship and deported, Canada "has to put enormous pressure on Latvia to accept him and to prosecute him once he gets there," Abella added.

Luitjens trying to come back

In other developments, Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi said there was no way convicted war criminal Jacob Luitjens will be allowed to return to Canada.

Luitjens, 75, spent the last 28 months in a Dutch jail on collaboration charges for betraying Jews and Dutch resistance fighters to the Nazis.

Quoting Dutch newspapers, the Vancouver Sun reported that Luitjens has applied to return to British Columbia. The Pacific region of Congress would consider applying for intervener status if Luitjens gains a court hearing to try to return to Canada, The CJN's Maurice Lucow reports.

Michael Elterman, community relations chair for the Pacific region, said he doubts the Canadian government would allow Luitjens to return, but "he may take a chance. He may even hire a lawyer to make an application for him."

Meanwhile Luitjens continues to receive his pensions from the University of British Columbia, where he was a botany lecturer, and from the Canada Pension Plan, Lucow reported.

Michael Bregman is the reigning king of coffee

Second Cup, the second largest coffee chain in North America

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When Second Cup head Michael Bregman helped out in the family business while growing up — his father, Louis, began The Bagel King — he was sure he was not going to follow in the footsteps of his grandfather and his father and become a baker.

Instead, Bregman is now Canada's reigning king of coffee with 205 Second Cup franchises from coast to coast and Coffee Plantation outlets in the U.S.

The Second Cup is currently the second largest coffee chain in North America. Starbucks, a U.S. company, holds the number one spot.

Gazing out the window of his west end Toronto office, Bregman sees the city below bathed in sunlight. It's a terrific day, just like business at The Second Cup.

Starting at age 10, Bregman worked behind the coffee bar at a Bagel King branch his father opened in Yorkdale in the mid-60s. "In order to get my allowance I worked with him on Saturdays. I served sandwiches and cold drinks," said Bregman. "I did that for many years on Saturdays and sometimes when I had time off I would work in the bread factory."

Bregman, now 40, said he decided to avoid the bakery business since the retail side had declined over the years and "because it was my father's business and I was going to do something different."

But Bregman freely admits he broke his own rule about the bakery business after getting his MBA at Harvard and serving as director of corporate development and bakery operations at Loblaw's. In 1979 Bregman, his father and a silent partner from out west formed Mmmuffins Ltd., the operator and franchiser of Muffin Break and Michel's Baguette.

They have since sold the thriving Mmmffins Ltd. as they acquired The Second Cup at the end of 1988 and decided to focus on specialty coffee, he said.

Taking Second Cup from 130 stores to 205 in a little more than six years, Bregman introduced cafe latte, cappuccino and iced espresso to his franchise. The Second Cup has gone through an enormous transformation, he said, "because coffee consumption is becoming so much more sophisticated."

Did Bregman anticipate the explosive growth in coffee consumption? Not really, he says. "We acquired The Second Cup because it was such a compatible business with Marvellous Mmmuffins. We had a lot of locations near one another in shopping malls, it was a business we understood. It was after we got in there that we started to understand the kind of emerging trends we are seeing so clearly now, in terms of specialty coffee consumption and specialty drinks, in gourmet coffee that by now is not new, and a very pronounced trend that's been sweeping North America."

To get in on the U.S. action, The Second Cup acquired the Arizona-based Coffee Plantation in 1993. There are currently nine locations in that state. One of the larger spots, the Tempe coffeehouse, can accommodate up to 250 people. In the next year the company plans to open 15 Coffee Plantation outlets in Arizona, California and Texas.

In spite of its growth and its profitability — the Second Cup made more than $2 million in profit from June 1993 to June 1994 and is debt free — company shares on the Toronto Stock Exchange have remained stubbornly low. Second Cup shares are currently selling for less than their offering price of $7.

"That's one of the things we talk about around here because the company is doing so well, but that hasn't been reflected in the value. Part of that is definitely because small-cap [capitalization] securities in this country have been somewhat neglected," said Bregman. "There's been more attention paid to larger companies. Some of the institutions have actually had a reduction in their small-cap funds. But there are probably other reasons as well — that we just haven't got our story well known out there.

"We've just done some comparisons to the value of Second Cup versus all other similar, comparable companies around North America, and by virtually any measure it's terribly undervalued. But I think at the end of the day if we continue to do a good job and the earnings come forward and we're able to continue to grow, the value will be reflected in the stock."

He expects the company to grow rapidly in Canada, at least 20 to 25 per cent a year, and much more than that in profits. "Percentage wise we'll be growing faster in the United States, but it's still a relatively small business down there. We have tremendous growth in front of us in both countries," he said.

Outside of the office, Bregman, married with a son and three daughters, is an active volunteer in the Jewish community and a fitness buff.

He is currently a member of the board of directors of Mount Sinai Hospital, was co-chair of the major gifts division of the United Jewish Appeal (UJA) and has plans to be involved in this year's UJA campaign in another capacity.

"I'm lucky enough to be in a position to help out in some small way people who aren't as lucky. I think that's a part of life that's quite important to me."

Market grows for resale clothes

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Where can you buy Laura Ashley, Roots, Gap and OshKosh clothing for kids at much lower than retail price? At Happily Ever After, a children's resale shop at 385 John St. in Thornhill.

Owner Susan Bernstein, a lawyer by training, says she opened the store almost three years ago, when she became inundated with good quality clothes and toys that were still in great shape but that her son had outgrown. "I wanted to recycle the things that, with proper care, can last forever."

Bernstein says resale is quite popular in the United States and definitely a trend of the future in Canada. "Canadians are still a little conservative about buying resale items but I've found that people who have sold me clothing are now buying from the store as well. This is not a consignment shop — customers are paid when the items are brought in, generally about one-third the retail value of the items."

Susan Bernstein helps clients pick an outfit at Happily Ever After.

Racks at Happily Ever After are jammed with designer clothes in sizes ranging from newborn to 10 or 12. Labels include such names as Mexx, Francoix Bouthaillier, Mousefeathers, Bravo, Deux par Deux, Roots, the Gap and Laura Ashley. As well, there are Perego and Chicco strollers and at different times, there may be a wooden glider or a Fisher Price wagon.

"These items are in great shape and will last forever. The clothes can be washed over and over again and still look like new.

"People come in for the first time and they are shocked that it is a second-hand store. Everything looks brand new. I have a 7-year-old son and a 2-year-old daughter, and I will not buy anything unless I would dress my own kids in it. I feel good about what I do. I am giving people who cannot normally buy designer clothing for their kids the opportunity to do so. There are a number of second-hand children stores in the city, but I do not think there are any others that sell only designer labels."

After recently paying a customer $800 for items she brought into the store, Bernstein says it really is a win-win situation. "Both the buyers and sellers are happy and most sellers also buy. I've had such a good response from people who want to sell me clothes that there is now an eight-month waiting list for an appointment."

She says she recently began taking in new designer samples in selected sizes which she sells at much lower than retail prices. "Once customers get used to top quality clothing at lower prices, they can't go back into department stores."

Heritage Fine Clothing

By RUTH SCHWEITZER

TORONTO — Heritage Fine Clothing did their homework before they opened their spacious retail and manufacturing outlet, which offers thousands of high quality men's and women's suits and coats at wholesale prices.

"We found in the industry low end stores with low prices and high end stores with high prices," said David Rosenberg, the company president. "There were no high end stores with low prices and that's where heritage has positioned itself."

Prices are low for several reasons, he said.

Their stock of Italian-designed garments created from premium European fabrics is made on the premises, allowing the company to eliminate the mark-up added by retailers, as well as other costs.

Operating out of a single store at a slightly out-of-the-way location on Orfus Road also helps keep overhead to a minimum.

Volume is high — a quarter of a million people visit the store each year.

The company purchases accessories in volume, including ties, shirts, sweaters and blouses, and passes their savings on to customers.

"We realize these are tough economic times for Canada," said Rosenberg. "We realize that if we do not give maximum quality for the best price we will not be here."

Along with favorable pricing, Heritage offers a size and color selection in high end clothing that Rosenberg says is "unprecedented under one roof" for a non-department-type store. Stock in popular sizes includes more than 200 men's suits and about 150 to 200 women's suits for each available color. Heritage carries sizes two to 20 for women and men's sizes 36 to 52.

Four boutique areas for women, each highlighting garments in a particular color, include other items in complementary colors and accessories. Suits in the four areas of the store designated for men are not as artfully displayed as the women's clothing since men's shopping habits are different from women's.

"Men just want to find their size and leave," said Rosenberg. "Women like to spend a couple of hours looking around."

Both men's and women's suits and coats are made in accordance with the Jewish law of shatnas.

Heritage's staff of 40 full- and part-time salespeople have fashion backgrounds and five on-site tailors are available to discuss alterations with customers.

Services include valet parking and electronic change rooms that lock automatically when customers exit. An employee at the entrance to the change rooms buzzes customers back in.

Heritage rents a corner of its huge facility to Fancy Diamond Jewellery, a company that manufactures jewelry on-site and sells directly to the public.

Rosenberg, 27, and his sister Anita Rosenberg-Gleberzon, 31, bought the business from their father, Nathan, in 1993. David Rosenberg has a business and marketing degree from Ryerson Polytechnic University; Anita, a York University psychology graduate, holds a fashion consulting diploma from George Brown College.

Heritage was originally a Montreal manufacturer that supplied menswear stores, including Lido Men's Shop, which Nathan Rosenberg opened in 1962. Rosenberg and a group of investors purchased the Montreal company in 1979 and relocated it to Toronto.

In 1981, when Heritage was on the verge of bankruptcy, Rosenberg suggested that they sell directly to the public. His partners were skeptical, so he, with an associate who eventually left the business, bought them out. They opened the Orfus Road location in 1982.

Documentary examines Christian anti-Semitism

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

The tragic and often violent encounter between Judaism and Christianity is the subject of Shadow on the Cross, to be broadcast on Vision TV on April 12 at 9 p.m.

This sensitive British documentary examines 2,000 years of Christian anti-Semitism, and heralds the onset of a new era in Christian-Jewish relations.

Leading Christian theologians and scholars appear in the 52-minute film, which was shot on location in Britain, Israel, Germany and the United States. All say or imply that anti-Semitism is a blot on the fabric of Christianity.

Franklin Littell, an American theologian, puts it into proper perspective. How, he wonders, do we deal with the fact that six million Jews were killed by baptized Christians? "I call that a credibility crisis," he declares.

As he and others theorize, the litany of anti-Jewish measures adopted by the Nazis — ghettos, the yellow star, expulsions — were conceived and implemented by the church hundreds of years before the rise of Hitler.

Not surprisingly, one of the most ardent Nazis, Julius Streicher, was a disciple of Martin Luther, the revolutionary theologian who described Jews as a "rejected and condemned people."

Shadow on the Cross also raises another disturbing point. Jesus was originally Jewish, yet many Christians deny or repress this fact. This unsettling question is discussed at length.

Despite the past, Christians and Jews have embarked upon the path of reconciliation, we're told, but much more remains to be done. Christianity should abandon its efforts to convert Jews, acknowledge its debt of gratitude to Judaism, and make amends for its indifference to Jewish suffering during the Holocaust.

The Lapirovs Go West

Another absorbing program is The Lapirovs Go West, an 80-minute documentary about three Russian Jewish emigres, to be broadcast on TVOntario April 12 at 10 p.m.

French film-maker Jean-Luc Leon's film begins as Ilya Lapirov, the head of the household, returns to Moscow after 11 years. He sits with old friends and regales them with anecdotes about the marvels of America.

The film then moves back to 1981, the year the Lapirovs — Ilya, wife Bella and 9-year-old son Kiesha — move to Los Angeles.

The streets of Los Angeles are hardly paved with gold. Living off welfare, the Lapirovs realize they must work exceedingly hard to succeed in a country where "time is money."

Ilya attends English classes and studies to be a hospital technician, while Bella toils for what appears to be an unscrupulous Soviet employer. Kiesha, now Ken, dreams of becoming rich and living in Beverly Hills.

By 1992 the Lapirovs have made progress. They own a mortgaged flat in a better neighborhood; they are both working; and Ken is studying law. The family revisits Moscow, where Ilya is insulted by an anti-Semite on the sidewalk. Ken, thorougly Americanized, feels like a stranger in his former homeland.

Full of insights and humor, The Lapirovs Go West is an instructive documentary on a topic rarely aired on television. It whets the appetite for more such films.

Book has advice on comforting mourners

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One of the hardest obligations for Jews to fulfil is visiting those who are sitting shivah.

Dealing with one's own feelings about the one who has died is hard enough. But knowing what to say to the mourners, and what one ought to do to comfort them is a very real concern.

Do you talk about the person who has died, or will that make the mourner feel worse? Do you ask for details? Do you ask how the mourner feels?

Or do you change the subject entirely, and discuss politics, sports, children, anything to get the mourner's mind off his or her grief.

Do Jews send cards? Bring flowers?

And suppose you are the mourner. Are you obligated by Halachah or by common courtesy to respond to questions you don't want to answer? Should you try and be as "good company" as you can?

Help is at hand. Rabbi Aaron Levine, current vice-principal and incumbent senior principal of Eitz Chaim Schools, and a columnist for The CJN, has written an excellent book To Comfort the Bereaved: A guide for mourners and those who visit them (Jason Aronson, 1994).

Rabbi Levine has written extensively about laws and customs concerning the sick, the dying, death and now shivah. His Zichron Meir, in Hebrew, is an exhaustive guide to the field, and he has published in English The Complete Yizkor Handbook and Bikkur Cholim, visiting the sick.

This book concentrates specifically on the time before the burial, the shivah period, comforting the mourner and the mourner himself.

Anecdotes clarify points

What I found helpful was anecdotes, parables and midrashic stories that illustrate the customs or clarify the points Rabbi Levine is trying to make.

Some are well known, such as the story of the wife of Rabbi Meir, who, after finding her two sons dead, asked her husband whether she was required to return something of great value she had been asked to keep for someone else.

When an astonished Rabbi Meir replied that of course she did, she showed him the bodies of their sons, comforting him that their souls had returned to G-d.

Others are less familiar, but equally poignant, such as the account of a wise man who asked a grieving mother to find a mustard seed from a home that was free of sorrow. During her search, she realized there was no such place — but she could mitigate her own sorrow by comforting others.

The book is a fount of information on dealing with a mourner, including such basic questions as what the meal eaten on the return from the cemetery should consist of, whether a mourner is obligated to stand up when a distinguished person comes to visit them (the answer is no) and bringing gifts to the shiva house.

To Comfort the Bereaved is available in Jewish book stores.

Eye on Arts

Children Of The Storm: Two non-Jewish students, terrorized by members of the Hitler Youth for associating with Jewish friends, find themselves at a moral crossroads. Under duress, one chooses the road toward Nazism by renouncing his Jewish friends and all things Jewish. Under equal duress, the other opposes the Nazi bullies.

This is one of the stories in Children of the Storm, a play by Johnathon Hoskins that explores the turbulent Nazi era from the perspective of four teenagers in Austria. It's being performed at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts on April 13, 16 and 18 to 22, and at the Bathurst Street Theatre April 27 to 29. For more information, telephone 416-635-7969.

The Dreamers: This first play by 78-year-old Toronto actor Irving Hoffman about a Jewish family is set to have its world premiere this month at the Robert Gill Theatre, 214 College St., Toronto.

Irving's theatrical background extends back to 1935 when he performed with the acclaimed Theatre of Action. He appeared in many feature roles during television's early days and he also worked in film and theatre. He studied voice with the late Lorne Greene and acting with David Pressman and Hollywood director Daniel Mann.

In order to support his family, Irving took a break from acting and began a career first as a hairdresser and later as a beauty supplies salesman. Since returning to acting, Irving has appeared in several CBC productions.

Play dates are April 26 to 30. Matinees are at 2 p.m. each day, evening performances at 7.30 p.m., April 28 and 29 only. The director is Vrenia Ivonoffski.

Media Watch: Just after actor Tom Hanks, star of Forrest Gump, received the best actor award at the 67th Academy Awards last week, Stephen Spielberg came on stage to award the Best Director Oscar to Robert Zemeckis for the same film.

Spielberg graced the cover of Time magazine last week, along with David Geffen and Jeffrey Katzenberg, his partners in the new Hollywood studio DreamWorks.

The Time article focused on the rush of excitement generated by the founding of DreamWorks, but conveyed the opinions of a few naysayers — including Hanks, whose unfortunate choice of words was printed in large display type: "I guarantee that, when their first film premieres, everyone will say, 'This is it? This is what these three geniuses have come up with?' ... Everybody is rooting for their failure."

In Brief: The Balkan Express, a play presented by the Company of Sirens, runs at The Poor Alex until April 9. It's a one-woman show by talented Yugoslav actor Mimi Vulovic, from a script by Slavenka Drakulic on the reflections of a journalist on the civil war in that country. 416-975-9642.

Musica Viva & Friends consists of Viki Blechta on flute, Grigory Goldberg on cello, Cecilia Ignatieff on piano. The ensemble, with guests Senia Trubashnik on oboe and Katharine Rapoport on viola, performs works by Mozart, Telemann, Damase and Srul Irving Glick at the First Unitarian Congregation, 175 St. Clair Ave. W., April 9 at 3 p.m. Adults, $15.

The Uptown Gallery opened last week at 43 Martin Ross Ave., Unit 1, North York, featuring works by noted Canadian and international artists Jeffrey Holland, Ruben Zellermeyer and Marc Chagall. "Until now there has not been a fine arts gallery in the uptown area offering a range of top quality works of art at great prices," says director Rebwar Shaban.

Livent chair Garth Drabinsky, whose new autobiography Closer to The Sun has prompted enormous media attention, was in the spotlight again when Billboard magazine honored him with its International Achievement Award for Business during Canada Music Week.

Amadeus Ensemble leader Moshe Hammer welcomes special guest Norbert Kraft for an evening of Latin and Italian music for violin and classical guitar. The concert, featuring works by Paganini, de Falla, Piazzola and Villa-Lobos, takes place in the Glenn Gould Studio, 250 Front St. W., Toronto, on April 9 at 8 p.m. Tickets available at the door or by calling 416-205-5555.

Concentration Camp Documentary: Memories of the Camps is a powerful, hour-long documentary showing actual footage of the Allied armies liberating the Nazi concentration camps. It was made years ago but deemed too explosive for the television medium; Alfred Hitchcock apparently had a hand in its editing. It's being shown to mark the 50th anniversary of the liberation of Buchenwald by CBC Newsworld on "The Passionate Eye," Sunday April 9, 9:30 p.m.

Klezmer band enthralls fans

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The raggedy klezmer musicians of Eastern Europe reincarnated into "suits" employing high-tech wizardry captivated a sold-out audience of 1,600 at Convocation Hall.

The recent concert was in support of Yiddish courses at the University of Toronto.

From the moment they stepped on stage, for the first time in Toronto, the 11 members of the Klezmer Conservatory Band of Boston had the audience in thrall, demonstrating a high degree of professionalism. As leader Hankus Netsky, resplendent in a purple suit, put it, they have left the myths of the poverty-stricken klezmers behind.

Though the old Yiddish folk and theatre songs were enthusiastically received, the hit of the evening was the band's own Frelich Fantastique, a foot-stomping take-off on pieces by Beethoven, Mozart, Strauss, Stravinsky and Gershwin.

And a close runner-up was Klezified, a Romanian horah, written by the band's violin virtuoso Miriam Rabson, and featuring out of this world innovations on the klezmer style by drummer Grant Smith.

The original klezmers never saw anything like the sliver of a bass or toothpick violin used by this band, instruments designed for their portability, according to Netsky.

The crowd favorite was the talented clarinettist Ilene Stahl, dressed in red, front and centre, who poured so much physical energy into the numbers that one expected only a blob of sweat to remain where the performer once stood.

Scores in the audience couldn't resist the urge to dance and they filled the aisles, giving a fervent "amen" to vocalist Judy Bressler's closing words, "Let's dance so joyously it will give our enemies a pain."

A gala at Knox College attended by 450 followed the concert. Guests were welcomed by Eda Zimler Shiff, president of Friends of Yiddish and Bayla Chaikoff, chair, Committe for Yiddish Studies, University of Toronto, concert sponsors.

The Haggadah

Which Haggadah will you be using at your seder this year? There are more than 30 different Haggadot in print. These include versions produced by each of the Jewish denominations as well as by groups fostering feminism, leftist politics, ecumenism and gay rights.

The Haggadah has been reprinted more often and in more places than any other Jewish classic work. It has also been the most frequently illustrated. Over 3,500 extant editions have been catalogued thus far, and unknown editions continually come to light. These editions vary in text, format, commentaries, translations, illustrations and type faces.

Yosef Yerushalmi in his monumental work Haggadah and History indicates that there is hardly a city or a town in the world "where a Hebrew press once functioned which has not produced at least one Haggadah. It has been translated into almost every language spoken by Jews throughout their global dispersion."

The first full rendering of what is basically our present Haggadah was included in the prayerbook edited by the Babylonian scholar, Rabbi Amram ben Sheshnah, in the ninth century CE. He introduced rabbinical midrash and commentary on the Haggadah, against the wishes of the Karaites who were active at the time and who opposed any interpretation of biblical passages.

Saadya, in the 10th century, and Maimonides in the 12th century, simply included the Haggadah as part of their larger collection of prayers. It was only in the 13th century that the Haggadah emerged as a separate book.

The origins of the printed Haggadah remain obscure. What is believed to be the first extant copy has been ascribed to the Hebrew press in Guadalajara, Spain, in 1482. Other printed Haggadot soon followed in Italy and Turkey. But it was not until the 19th century that it became customary for every participant in the seder to hold his or her own copy.

Modern Haggadot have been illustrated by a number of prominent artists such as Ben Shahn, Arthur Szyk, Leonard Baskin, Saul Raskin and David Moss. During and after World War II, the Israeli Kibbutzim produced many distinctive, most of them extolling the virtues of working the soil.

The recent upsurge of interest in illuminated Haggadot, stimulated by technical advancements in printing, has made possible the publication of splendid reproductions at reasonable prices.

One of the most beautiful among these is the Birds Head Haggadah. It dates from about 1300 and is the oldest illuminated Haggadah so far known, at least as far as the Ashkenazi type is concerned. One of its most striking features is the large eagle-beaked faces imposed on human figures, presumably because endowing human bodies with birds' heads was one way in which medieval Jewish artists sought to circumvent the prohibition against the making of images. The males in the pictures wear on their bird heads the conical "Jew's hat" introduced by the Lateran Council of 1215, and the female birds wear hair nets and jewelled pins which were stylish at the time.

Another famous illuminated volume of medieval origin is the Prague Haggadah (1527), containing the earliest wood-cut illustrations. Still another is the Kaufmann Haggadah, reprinted from a manuscript located in the Hungarian Academy of Science in Budapest.

The best known of medieval facsimiles is the Sarajevo Haggadah, considered "the most famous of Hebrew illuminated manuscripts." Like its Hungarian counterpart, the Sarajevo originated in the early part of the second half of the 14th century, probably in Spain.

Travel Talk

Hebrew University Bike Tour: A charity bike ride through the Negev desert has been organized by The Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University. That group's Mission With A Difference '95 has devised a cycling route that starts in Jerusalem, takes in several biblical and historic sites, and culminates about 300 kilometres later at the Red Sea port of Eilat. The group, which is limited to 100 participants, pedals approximately 50 km per day.

Sites include the Burma Road, built in 1948 as a bypass to the Arab Legion stronghold at Latrun; the Bar Kochba Caves at Amazia; Beersheva, the capital of the Negev and one of the world's oldest cities; Kibbutz Sde Boker, where David Ben-Gurion resided; Avdat, a city of the semi-nomadic Nabateans; the large Ramon Crater at Mitzpe Ramon; Timna Valley Park, with its amazing scenery and features such as Solomon's Pillars; and Eilat, with its sandy beaches and colorful coral reef.

Travel dates are Oct. 19 to 27. Cost to participants is $2,800, and each participant is required to raise a minimum of $1,500. Contact Merle Goldman, 416-485-8000 or at 1-800-668-3956 within Ontario and Quebec only. Fax: 416-485-8565. An information evening is being held on Thursday May 18.

A Bit of the Canadian Shield in France: In centuries past, furladen boats from Canada arriving at the French port of La Rochelle would empty their holds of rocks carried for ballast. These rocks were used to pave the city's streets. Situated on the coast about 470 km southwest of Paris, La Rochelle is served by the TGV Atlantique from the Montparnasse train station.

THE WAR IN EUROPE IS ENDED! SURRENDER IS UNCONDITIONAL

GERMANS CAPITULATE ON ALL FRONTS REICH CHIEF OF STAFF ASKS FOR MERCY

These were the headlines of The New York Times above a photo of thousands in Times Square celebrating Victory in Europe May 7, 1945. Here in Canada there had been rumors throughout the day that things were getting very close, that there would be a big announcement very, very soon. Those who waited out the day — never too far from a radio — would later recall again and again where they were and just what they were doing when the news came finally, blessedly and officially, at 8:41 p.m. Eastern Wartime.

If you belong to the generation that has personal memories of that landmark day, we invite you to share them with us, when The CJN marks the 50th anniversary of VE Day May 7.

Please put them in writing, not more than 200 words, and send it to us. Or, if you have a unique photograph of VE Day, please send that along as well.

Mail or deliver your submissions by April 28 to: The Canadian Jewish News, 10 Gateway Blvd., Suite 420, Don Mills, Ont. M3C 3A1. If you want us to return the material to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The CJN alone will decide whether to use any material submitted. As well, material may be subject to editing.

Hamas vows revenge

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Muslim radicals are vowing to avenge the deaths of three members of Hamas, killed in an ambush Sunday by Israeli security forces.

Israeli border policemen shot and killed three members of Hamas' armed wing, Izzadin Kassam, in a grove outside Hebron Sunday morning. Two of the dead were apparently among the most wanted Hamas terrorists.

However, Palestinians claimed that one man the Israelis said was killed was not among the dead.

Members of the Border Police undercover anti-terror unit ambushed the terrorists' car, apparently as they were on their way to attack Israelis.

Montreal braces for HLI conference

CJN Staff

MONTREAL — The Jewish community here is bracing for this week's conference of Human Life International (HLI), an American anti-abortion group that has been labeled anti-Semitic.

Dozens of organizations have planned protests against HLI, whose leader, Catholic priest Paul Marx, has blamed Jews for being at the forefront of the abortion movement.

Over 1,000 Montreal police have been put on special alert for the five days HLI will be in town, and they are expected to be out in force Wednesday night, when HLI members are scheduled to have a candlelight procession through Old Montreal.

Anti-racist, ethnic, labor and women's groups have planned frontline demonstrations against the conference, which is expected to attract 1,500 to 2,000 followers.

But Jewish organizations have decided against taking to the streets.

B'nai Brith was due to participate in a press conference Tuesday, along with other groups, to denounce HLI's ultra-right-wing ideology.

B'nai Brith wants to keep the focus on HLI's record of intolerance and racist statements and away from abortion, spokesperson Robert Libman told The CJN.

"We don't want to be seen as taking a position on abortion. [Street demonstrations] have a tendency to slip into confrontation and violence," Libman said.

The Quebec region of Canadian Jewish Congress is planning meetings with Andrew Hutchison, the Anglican Archbishop of Montreal, to find "a common position," Congress spokesperson David Sultan told The CJN Monday morning.

Congress says it too wants to keep the focus on HLI's racist, homophobic and anti-Semitic views.

"We are being very careful not to touch on abortion. It's not in our mandate," Sultan said.

Kids burned in ceremony

TORONTO — Five children burned during a pre-Passover ceremony in Richmond Hill are reported to be well on the road to recovery.

The five children, aged between three and 10, suffered second- and third-degree burns during the traditional burning of chometz held by staff of Ner Israel Yeshivah last Friday.

"The prognosis is excellent," said a school official who did not wish to be identified. The accident occurred after a 44-year-old man poured what police believe to be paint thinner on a dying oil-drum fire to reignite it.

The solvent flared up, burning the man's hand. He turned and inadvertently sprayed nearby children with a stream of burning fluid.

CANADA

Charpak Fellowship

OTTAWA — The Ottawa chapter of the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science has announced plans to create the Georges Charpak Fellowship, dedicated to promoting research between Canada and the institute, in the field of applied physics in life sciences.

Charpak won the 1992 Nobel Prize for physics. During World War II, he served with the French resistance and was incarcerated in Dachau.

The fellowship will endow, for up to one year, either a Canadian scientist engaged in research at the institute or an institute researcher in Canada.

A reception to celebrate the fellowship's establishment will take place June 6 at the residence of Israel's ambassador.

For information, call 613-236-3391.

ISRAEL

Protests Held

JERUSALEM — Anti-government protests were held last Tuesday night outside Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's residence in Jerusalem and Environment Minister Yossi Sarid's home in Tel Aviv.

Some 500 demonstrated outside Sarid's home. They carried signs, flags and torches, and chanted slogans against Rabin and the remarks Sarid made calling for the immediate removal of Jewish settlers in the Gaza Strip.

Burg Opposes Changes

JERUSALEM — Acting Jewish Agency chair Avraham Burg vowed last week to oppose any changes in the Law of Return.

Burg said he doesn't want to lose Jews because of changes in legislation which may close the doors to a spouse or other family members.

Muslims Win Status

JERUSALEM — Forty-six Bosnian Muslim refugees received permanent status in Israel last week, two years after they were brought here as part of a humanitarian rescue.

The refugees were among a group of about 85 from Bosnia that Israel took in February 1993.

The 46 who remained in Israel moved to Kibbutz Beit Oren on Mount Carmel, where they live and work.

Israel Radio reported that some have asked permission to bring relatives who had fled to Croatia.

The Israeli government is reportedly considering the request.

Chometz 'goy' is Jewish

JERUSALEM — Ahmed Mugrabi, who for years bought the nation's chometz from the chief rabbis before Passover, has been found to be the son of a Jewish mother, making him Jewish.

The discovery, which shocked the rabbis, forced them to find another gentile to whom to sell chometz.

Jerusalem businessman Salim Daoud agreed to fill in for Mugrabi at the sale, which took place last Thursday.

WORLD

Serbo-Croatian Haggadah

ROME — A new translation of the Haggadah into Serbo-Croatian has been printed in time for Passover by the beleaguered Jewish communities in the former Yugoslavia.

The Haggadah was prepared by Eliezer Jajcanin, a rabbinical student in Israel originally from Sarajevo.

Communal seders were scheduled to be held last week in many cities in the former Yugoslavia, including Sarajevo, Zagreb and Split in Croatia, and the Yugoslav capital of Belgrade.

Kosher Goods Available

SAN JOSE, Costa Rica — For the first time, kosher l'Pesach food and products were available here, in time for Passover.

Getting kosher food for the holiday used to mean ordering it in advance and travelling to Miami to pick it up.

Now, major supermarkets in this capital city are stocking kosher products, including meat and poultry.

Matzah and kosher wines, however, are still imported.

Costa Rica's Jewish community numbers about 2,500.

Swiss Jews Want Memorial

GENEVA — Jewish leaders here plan to petition the Swiss government to erect a monument to the thousands of Jewish refugees who were killed when Switzerland closed its borders to those fleeing Nazi Germany during World War II.

Swiss Jews recently circulated the petition and will present it to the government May 8, the 50th anniversary of the Allied victory over the Nazis.

During the war, Jewish refugees who crossed the German border into Switzerland were turned back on the orders of the Swiss chief of police.

Israel-Britain Trade

LONDON — Trade between Britain and Israel will reach $3.5 billion this year, as the Jewish state overtakes the oil-rich United Arab Emirates to become Britain's second biggest Middle East market, officials in London predicted last week.

Figures compiled by the Department of Trade and Industry show a "phenomenal" growth in business with Jerusalem.

Ties With Tunisia

BRUSSELS — Tunisia and Israel have agreed to open economic interest sections in Tunis and Tel Aviv soon, according to news reports here.

Interest sections are seen as a first step toward full diplomatic relations. Because the two countries have not yet agreed to establish embassies or consulates, each country's representatives are to be stationed in the Belgian embassies in Tel Aviv and Tunis.

Anti-Semitic Textbook

PRAGUE — The Czech Republic's Education Ministry reportedly says it will look into a new history textbook that Jewish leaders worldwide call anti-Semitic.

Handbook on Church History claims Jews in the Middle Ages took over money-lending businesses and were usurers who charged more than 100 per cent interest. It also says Jews committed ritual murders.

According to the U.S.-based Anti-Defamation League, the Education Ministry has ordered a review of the textbook.

Access Denied

ALBANY, N.Y. — The New York State Cable Commission has voted to permit cable companies to restrict the availability of their community access stations to those who live in the area served by their system.

The move is seen as a blow to Toronto-based Holocaust-denier Ernst Zundel, who attempted to get his neo-Nazi videotapes aired on community access stations in upstate New York.

Holocaust Survivors & Friends Education Centre proposed the new interpretation in mid-February after Zundel and an upstate supporter tried to convince cable stations across the state to air Zundel's material.

Sexuality report controversial in Canada

Rabbis divided over RA document

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A groundbreaking report on human sexuality, unanimously approved as an official document of the Rabbinical Assembly (RA) by its executive council earlier this year, is still a source of controversy among some Conservative rabbis in Canada.

The document, entitled "This Is My Beloved, This Is My Friend:" A Rabbinic Letter on Intimate Relations, is the result of three years' work by the RA's Commission on Human Sexuality. It underwent seven revisions, reflecting the input of member rabbis across North America.

The document puts forth a religious context for sexuality, including non-marital sex and homosexuality.

Rabbi Wayne Allen of Toronto's Beth Tikvah Synagogue is a Conservative rabbi who resigned from the RA in 1992. He sees the document as "fundamentally flawed and misguided.

"An assumption has been made by this document that what has become socially true has been elevated to the point of religious principle. The report doesn't condone [non-marital sex], but says that it's sometimes explicable," said Rabbi Allen.

"We should be aiming for a higher ideal. This seems to be a surrender to the sexual laxity of our society rather than an attempt to restate the ideals."

In fact, the 49-page report makes it very clear that sexual intercourse outside of marriage is not condoned by Judaism and discusses relevant Jewish values including modesty, respect, love, fidelity and safety.

Issues addressed in the document include teen sex, single parenthood, contraception, adultery, condoms and AIDS.

Rabbi Wayne Allen

Rabbi Kenneth Katz

The report strongly encourages couples to have three or four children and offers justification for following the laws of family purity. It is believed to be the first call on Conservative Jews to consider observing those laws, which include prohibition of sex during a women's menstrual period and for a week thereafter, followed by her immersion in a mikvah.

The paper's treatment of homosexuality amounts to a discussion of two differing rabbinic viewpoints. The issues are still under study by the RA.

'Risk worth taking'

"The document does take a risk," admitted Rabbi Joel Meyers, executive vice-president of the New York-based RA. "The feeling was that it was a risk worth taking. We did not want to put our heads in the sand."

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation agrees. "Not to speak on these subjects would be to indicate that we have nothing to say," he said. Rabbi Frydman-Kohl moderated a public debate about the report in January.

Rabbi Allen agrees that some of the issues raised in the letter "need to be addressed by Judaism," but he is against raising them publicly. "Certain issues are best resolved between the enquirer and the rabbi. What may be appropriate in one person's situation should not be generalized and communicated to the public."

Rabbi Kenneth Katz of Congregation Beth-El in Montreal used draft seven of the letter in a study session last Shavuot. He would use it again "without question."

Rabbi Katz said he doesn't have to agree with everything in the document, and praised the extensive footnotes which allow readers to refer to original sources and "recreate" the commission's debate.

"There's always a danger that some people will use it to justify something that wasn't intended, and that's a hard call," Rabbi Katz said, adding that the benefits of having such a document outweigh the risks of misinterpretation.

Rabbi Henry Balser of Winnipeg's Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, an egalitarian Conservative congregation, is not convinced. "I'm positive about the content ... but I question whether this is the kind of thing you say in public."

Rabbi Martin Cohen of Congregation Beth Tikvah in Richmond, B.C. is very much in favor of the letter. "I feel it's basically a great step forward. You can't publish a document this long that is not go ing to engender some controvrsy and that cannot be picked at in terms of this or that detail.

The report is one of few modern-day documents to address sexuality so comprehensively within a Jewish context. It also represents the first time the Conservative movement, as a unit, has addressed the issues in print.

"It was important for the movement as a whole to have some kind of joint statement, not one rabbi's opinion or another," said Los Angeles Rabbi Elliot Dorff, author of the report. "[Conservative rabbis] share much more than we disagree about. That's what makes us a movement."

Hate literature investigated at three Nova Scotia sites

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritimes Correspondent

HALIFAX — Police are investigating the appearance of hate literature in three locations of Nova Scotia's Annapolis Valley.

Anti-Semitic propaganda was mailed to a Kentville church, a local newspaper and a New Minas-based political group, Democratic Change Association.

A spokesperson from the New Minas detachment of the RCMP confirmed the investigation.

A package containing nine pages of racist material was received by the Kingsway Assembly Pentecostal Church in Kentville. The envelope had a Halifax postmark and was addressed to members of the church. The package included hand-written and typed letters, photocopied texts and invitations to join a new political party.

Warning of a growing "Zionist conspiracy" in Canada and urging readers to take up arms and join a "citizen revolution," the pages contained rambling denunciations of Jews.

A columnist with a weekly Kentville newspaper also received hate material, postmarked locally, which included a hand-written letter that referred to the "Zionist-controlled medical profession" and charged that Jewish doctors are prescribing "dangerous toxic drugs and operations." The letter stated Christianity is under attack and "all white Christians are expendable."

The Democratic Change Association, which believes in fiscal responsibility and accountable government, received two packages of racial material. Association president John Merriam told the Halifax Chronicle-Herald he threw the material in the garbage "where it belonged" but later called police because the distributor claimed association with his group.

Jon Goldberg, executive director of the Atlantic Jewish Council, called the incident "unfortunate" and said it might be related to 50th anniversary celebrations of the liberation of the camps. "Let's hope this is an isolated incident," he said.

Burdi convicted

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —The assault conviction last week of a key Canadian neo-Nazi is expected to put a damper on white supremacist plans to recruit young people.

The conviction will also prevent George Burdi, 24, from entering the United States. In recent years Burdi, a resident of Woodbridge, Ont., has produced hate recordings in Detroit under the Resistance Records label. He is also involved with Resistance magazine.

Last week in Ottawa, a seven-man, five-woman jury deliberated for almost five hours before finding Burdi guilty of kicking an anti-racist in the face during a wild brawl at the Canadian War Memorial on May 29, 1993.

Alicia Reckzin, 22, suffered a broken nose in the attack.

Burdi was in Ottawa with his band RaHoWa (Racial Holy War) to play a concert, which was broken up by anti-racists and the Ottawa police riot squad. Later, a group of white supremacists roamed through downtown Ottawa and Burdi and Heritage Front leader Wolfgang Droege led a charge into a group of anti-racists.

While several witnesses testified about Burdi's role in the melee, Burdi's only witness was Droege.

Droege, who entered the court wearing leg shackles, testified that he, not Burdi, led the charge against the anti-racists.

Burdi will be sentenced on May 11.

Congress lends a hand to help out Jews of Cuba

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The fastest growing Jewish community in the Diaspora is in Cuba, Canadian Jewish Congress president Irving Abella said after visiting the country at the invitation of the community.

There are now 1,412 Jews in Cuba, 50 per cent of them under the age of 30, Abella told the Congress, Ontario region executive "What other community has doubled in five years?"

Though Cuban Jews had to line up at 3 a.m. to buy food for a reception for the Canadian visitors, Abella said he found the visit "inspiring."

There is no official anti-Semitism by the Castro government, he reported. Jews are allowed to practice their religion without interference, and Castro's minister of religious affairs — "an oxymoron in an atheistic country" — was one of 400 attending the reception.

Many Jews have returned to the community, Abella said, recounting that Havana's new shochet was unable to take his usual 20-mile bicycle ride into the city for a week because he was newly circumcized.

Community leader Dr. Jose Miller credited the Passover food shipments organized by the Ontario region for keeping the Jewish community together, Abella said.

Havana's oldest synagogue, the Orthodox Adath Israel, is located in "the equivalent of a third-world slum," he said. After morning prayers, the congregants spent the rest of the day playing dominoes.

Havana is "Moscow without palm trees," Abella said, with no evidence of any new construction since 1950. "The country is caught in a time warp."

The buses he rode in Cuba were all from Canada and at Verraderro Beach he caught one still marked "Eglinton West," with Canadian advertisements in place. The Bathurst bus came along next.

Congress officer Jack Silverstone accompanied Abella.

CJC plenary to focus on national issues

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — No Quebec politicians have been invited to participate in Canadian Jewish Congress' national Plenary Assembly.

Due to the lack of time, the agenda will be limited to issues of a national nature, says the plenary's programming chair Sharon Wolfe.

Nor will there be much ruminating over the future of the Jews in Quebec. It's a departure from past assemblies in Montreal when prominent Quebec politicians, including then premier Rene Levesque, were eagerly anticipated speakers, and the inclusion of a session on the state of Quebec Jewry was almost pro forma.

The plenary May 14 to 15 at the Bonaventure Hilton Hotel will include a bilingual forum entitled Jewish Community Dynamics: Local, National and International, but nothing specifically on Quebec.

"The Quebec issue has been discussed ad infinitum," said Wolfe, a former special assistant to Brian Mulroney.

Labor Minister Lucienne Robillard, the federal cabinet member responsible for the referendum campaign, will speak on National Unity at the plenary luncheon.

There will also be no French-language session as such this year, other than the biligual forum and another plenary where Israeli Knesset member David Levy will participate.

No simultaneous translation will be offered either.

Making the best use of the limited time available was a priority in planning the program, said Wolfe, who until last year was a commissioner of the federal Immigration and Refugee Board.

Plenary is about half the length it usually is. The reason, she said, is mainly to hold the line on costs. The registration fee is $125.35, which does not include hotel or meals.

Congress is hoping for an attendance of 1,000.

The only event the community at large may attend is the night of May 14, moderated by television talk show host Shirley Solomon. The topic is the Changing Face of Anti-Semitism. Individual tickets are $18.

"We had three goals," Wolfe said. "We wanted to be relevant and avoid redundancy. We wanted it to be inclusive and avoid sessions where the converted were preaching to the converted; and we wanted it to be forward-thinking, to address the concerns of the future, rather than review the past."

That means there won't be special sessions for youth, small communities or Quebecers, for example.

Such issues as hate messages over the Internet, the impact of the recession on the Jewish community, intermarriage and assimilation, and the media's coverage of Jewish affairs will be dealt with in the concurrent forums.

Public advocacy is the topic of the opening plenary, Wolfe said, because "the proliferation of interest groups is making it increasingly difficult to get the ear of decision-makers."

A Diamond nomination

TORONTO — University student Robbie Diamond is running for associate chairman of the national executive of the Canadian Jewish Congress at the upcoming plenary in May.

"It's time my generation is represented at the highest levels in the Jewish community. My generation represents the vital link in the chain of Jewish continuity," Daimond said.

Diamond, a student at the University of Toronto, has interned with former external affairs secretary Barbara McDougall and with Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert. He helped plan the recent Jewish Students' Network national convention.

"It is time to view my generation and students as equal members of the community. We must be active participants in the decision making processes, rather than only objects of the decisions."

Children invited to take part in Jerusalem art contest

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Children from around the world are being invited to show their vision of Jerusalem.

The art contest, The Children of the World Draw Jerusalem at 3000, sponsored by Israeli Ministers of Education Amnon Rubenstein and Ehud Olmert, mayor of Jerusalem, is coordinated by local Israeli consulates.

Children between the ages of 7 and 14, either individually or as a group, can submit drawings or paintings. Deadline for submissions is June 9. Entries will be sent to Israel for judging.

Twelve prizes will be awarded, each consisting of a week in Israel, including airfare, for a child and escort, and a silver coin. Prizes for group projects will be awarded to the school or institution. Each child whose entry is displayed in the final round exhibition will receive a certificate and album about Jerusalem.

Some suggested topics are Jerusalem of gold, Me in Jerusalem, Stories of Jerusalem and Jerusalem in the future.

This year's event helps mark 3,000 years since King David established Jerusalem as the capital of Israel.

Information has been sent to public libraries, day schools and community centres.

In Canada, the event is being coordinated by Israeli consulates in Toronto and Montreal. For more information, or to submit an entry, contact the Consulate General of Israel, 180 Bloor St. W., Toronto, Ont. M5S 2V6, telephone 416-961-1126,

Jordan's King Hussein gets cozy with Chrétien

Scene in Ottawa

By RICHARD CLEROUX

King Hussein of Jordan and his Good Queen Noor were here earlier this month. The king was going home after a regular cancer checkup at the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn., and stopped off for refuelling and a little chat with Prime Minister Jean Chretien. His comments at a news conference later showed how far the peace process has progressed in the Middle East.

After all, King Hussein is the same Jordanian ruler who only four years ago was on "the wrong side" in the Gulf War. Now here he was purring about his new peace treaty with Israel and saying all sorts of nice things about his country's future with the Jewish nation, about his obligation to "give future generations the chance to live their lives in a way we never had" and what "a worthy cause" it is to bring together in peace "the descendants of the children of Abraham."

The king, it turned out, had heard about the upcoming free trade deal between Canada and Israel. And he wants a free trade deal with Canada too — just like the one Israel is getting — whatever it is.

"We would certainly like to have exactly the same arrangements as far as the agreement you refer to in regards to trade," King Hussein told reporters with Chretien at his side.

Chretien himself had made the free trade offer, unprompted, moments earlier.

"We would be happy to negotiate a free trade agreement with them like we've done with the neighbor country," the prime minister blurted out to reporters. That was awfully nice of Chretien. Chretien could hardly say Canada and Jordan have been longtime allies, so instead, he joked that King Hussein was like himself, "a survivor" of many political changes. It went over well.

Considering the recent past history of the two nations, the pair could hardly get any cozier. Not that His Highness had forgotten Canada's role in the Gulf War. He simply had a new spin on it: "Our friendship with your country has grown through difficult circumstances and times. When Jordan was misunderstood by the rest of the world, you understood us, and stood by us."

Jordan's King Hussein with Prime Minister Jean Chretien.

Actually Canada did more than just stand by. It sent the fleet over to the Gulf and vetoed all trade with Jordan for the duration of the war, because material going to Jordan was ending up in Iraq.

Now with the peace accord, all has been forgotten, except for the fact that bilateral trade with Jordan is still languishing. It was a piddling $9.3 million from January to August 1994 with a ratio of nine to one in Canada's favor. By comparison Canada-Israel trade for the same period was $202.7 million — a big difference.

The Canada-Israel free trade deal will also likely allow Israel, which makes excellent helicopters, to bid on the upcoming multibillion dollar Canadian contract to replace our navy's aging Sea King helicopters — the deal the Tories signed and the Liberals cancelled in 1993.

In return Israel is looking the other way while Saint John Shipbuilding Ltd., an Irving shipyard, with the help of the Canadian government is trying to sell three Canadian-made navy frigates to Kuwait and maybe one or two more to Saudi Arabia.

The shipyard recently opened an office in Kuwait, and the navy sent the HMCS Fredericton on manoeuvres in the Gulf of Oman last month, just in case somebody nearby wanted to see a frigate in action on the high seas. The fully-automated frigates, considered the finest attack ships of their size in the world, are the envy of the world's navies.

In the past, putting the world's most sophisticated fighting ship in the hands of an Arab country, especially a precariously positioned one, would have sparked the ire of Israel, the Canadian Jewish community and Canada's NATO allies. But the times have changed in the Middle East. We are no longer in 1990 and today the talk is of trade, not war.

As King Hussein told reporters: "We hope that the peace treaty will be a solid building block for trade and that you will be a partner in exploring possibilities that peace offers to the region."

Somebody at the news conference asked if that meant Canada would be selling Jordan those 39 refurbished CF-5 jet fighters that until recently were headed for Turkey (until it attacked the Kurds). King Hussein looked over at Chretien and asked if the fighter jets were for sale.

Wisely, Chretien replied they were not.

The Mimouna

They called the man Saba Shalom although he was not their grandfather. The term Saba was an acknowledgment of his vast wisdom and of their deep love for him. In every word he spoke, in every hand he extended, he touched and exalted the humanity in others.

"Saba" died more than a decade ago, alone, in Haifa. And like the sound of a solitary violin string dividing the silence, he left no tangible signature except his memory, now forever in the hearts of those who knew him. Recalled often, his voice is heard again and again, gentle, wise, generous, and inspiring.

He taught visitors about Mimouna, the holiday celebrated by the Jews of North Africa on the last night of Passover. When many of us in the Galut and in Israel are scurrying to put away the Passover dishes, Mimouna celebrants are exchanging visits, conveying greetings, and sharing sweet hospitality.

Many in our predominantly Ashkenazi community, do not know about Mimouna. But in our view it is a lesson worth learning. Thus, in this issue of The CJN we have assembled a collage of articles appropriate to the occasion, explaining and reminiscing.

Our reporter Elias Levy writes about the origins of the holiday, its special foods, and the manner in which it is celebrated today in Israel. Renee Levy remembers with dreamlike affection a childhood Mimouna in Casablanca. We have an article about Chakatiyah, the unique melange of Hebrew, Arabic and French, spoken by many of North Africa's Jews. Brigitte Dayan poignantly recounts an almost mystical pilgrimage to her great grandfather's grave in Marakesh. And Rabbi Yehiel Benayon elegantly provides a wider cultural context for the festival.

Mimouna is a holiday of joy. It beckons: "Come share my table, be my guest and let us bid one another happiness and prosperity". In the words of the traditional Mimouna greeting: Terbh'ou Outsaad'ou .

At long last, the first step

The bombings last week in Gaza have finally invoked a substantive response from Yasser Arafat. As of this writing, the Palestinian police was reported to have arrested some 250 supporters of the Islamic extremists. Israeli authorities have commended his action. It appears to have been the first tough security measure taken against the radical anti-peace forces.

However Israel's commendation was not an effusive encomium. It was simply an acknowledgment of Arafat's having at long last taken the first step in protecting the peace process. Government officials are encouraged, but wary.

Arafat's reaction was indeed bona fide but it was prompted as much out of self-interest as it was out of bilateral interest. He knows that the threat from the extremists is directed at him as well. And it is no mere political threat. It is aimed at his very life.

Out of such horrible grief

Untimely death is always sorrowful. But the death of a child is a more cruel sorrow. Among the seven who were killed by the bomb blasts in Gaza was a young American student from Brandeis University, Alisa Flatow, z'l. After consulting with Rabbi Moshe Tendler, a widely respected Orthodox expert on biomedical ethics, her parents, Stephen and Rosalyn Flatow of West Orange, N.J., decided to donate their daughter's organs to needy patients in Israel. Thus, her heart, liver, lungs and kidneys were given to different individuals, and her corneas were donated to an eye bank.

Alisa's father explained the decision by saying Alisa would be making "a lasting contribution to the people of Israel."

We are moved to comment upon the parents' strength and upon their dedication to humanity. They are an example to us all. Out of such horrible personal grief, still a striving for life's betterment.

Lessons of Brandeis-Bardin Institute

One year ago the California earthquake severely damaged a very special resource to the Jewish community.

The Brandeis-Bardin Institute, located just north of Los Angeles, brings together Jews from various parts of the world and offers them an opportunity to experience Jewish life in a unique way. A kibbutz-like environment situated in the Simi Valley on 3,500 acres of desert land reminiscent of Israel, Brandeis is the perfect setting to investigate and discover the values and ideals integral to Jewish identity.

As a 26-year-old woman who never really believed in God, I travelled to Brandeis to explore my "Jewishness." Brandeis provided the environment which allowed me to search, the resources with which to study, and scholars who encouraged me to question that which I had always denied. Brandeis also taught me that to be a Jew, not only to be Jewish, is something of which to be deeply proud. For these two lessons, I am grateful.

Absurd claims of lost tribes

In his quest for the lost tribes of Israel, Rabbi Eliyahu Avichail apparently overlooked some 50 million Englishmen, because the Anglo-Israel movement considers these to be true descendants of the ancient Israelites. British means "B'rith Ish" (covenant of man).

But not to worry, Rabbi Avichail determined that those 27,290 Manassites exiled some 2,700 years ago by Assyrian King Pul (Tiglath-Pileser III) raised plenty of descendants; 20 million in former British India, Afghanistan and the Philippines, 18 million Brazilians, millions of Latin-Americans ... not to mention about 40 million Africans, from Nigeria to the Sudan.

No wonder that Israel's minister of immigration, Yair Tsaban, stated that: "We witness a phenomenon of non-Jews eager to join Judaism, if doing so means entering the State of Israel, thereby significantly upgrading their standard and quality of life."

Not surprising that the Jewish Agency's director of immigration, Uri Gordon, bluntly rejected Rabbi Avichail's allegations in declaring that: "These are people willing to do anything to reach the West ... According to Israeli law [of return], one Jewish grandparent is sufficient. Therefore the State of Israel needs to decide whether or not to convert to Judaism innumerable tens of millions of poverty-stricken Third World people who allege to be of Jewish ancestry."

Similar views were expressed by the deputy foreign minister of the State of Israel, Yossi Beilin. "The State of Israel is a very attractive country. Therefore it is not surprising that increasing numbers of Third World people call themselves 'Jews.' "

Need one have to pronounce on the absurdity and non-legitimacy of these claims to be those "lost" tribes of the Israelitic kingdom?

Escaping the Final Solution

By Sarah Ostrzega Greening

I experienced five concentration camps and two labor camps where they kept us as slaves for ammunition factories and three death camps — all representing unimaginable inhuman conditions, slavery, starvation, torture.

We were forced to watch each time when some of us were hung on gallows erected in the centre of the camp or murdered with machine guns.

When the Germans forced us to march to Dachau, which we knew meant death, I decided I am not going. I am running. On both sides of the road there was forest — good camouflage. I told the three girls walking next to me to come with me. "We are running to freedom," I told them.

We ran in a zig-zag manner to avoid the bullets. I realized I had a white kerchief on my head which gave me away, so I pulled it down. Six more girls run after me, so together, 10 of us escaped. A few weeks later Germany surrendered.

With my last breath, I faced freedom. Free, but still in the powerful grip of death. I was left all alone, the only one of so many of my immediate family, relatives close and far, no parents, grandparents, aunts, uncles, cousins, siblings., no old people, no children.

I contemplate suicide, but reason with myself, immerse myself in studies instead.

I dream of an international society working toward understanding between nations and religions. I dream to raise a child of every race as a manifestation to the world that people can live in harmony and understanding instead of killing one another.

Emaciated from my ordeal and starvation, I couldn't utilize the nourishment I took. I fell ill. I was rushed to a hospital in Verishoffen, Bavaria, Germany. The doctor explained that my intestines were very weak, thin like strings and twisted. He didn't think I would make it. A priest came to give me the last rites, but when he came back a few days later, shock, disbelief, surprise was written on his face seeing me alive. He told me he was witnessing a miracle. I smiled shyly and told him in German I couldn't just simply say good bye and leave since I had to wait for the rabbi.

I also thanked him for caring for my soul. I was polite, but inside me was unbearable pain. I asked myself: where were people like him when the Germans did such an excellent job in murdering our people?

Celebrating Jewish living with gusto: Mimouna

By RABBI YEHIEL BENAYON

One of my earliest and most vivid childhood memories is of my grandmother dipping rolled lettuce leaves into honey and putting them in our mouths. It was Pesach; well, not really Pesach. It was the Mimouna, a day marking the end of Pesach.

Pesach is a bittersweet occasion. To appreciate freedom, the holiday tells us to first sample deprivation. Matzah, the bread of affliction, is eaten for eight days; the maror, bitter herbs and the charoset all underscore this. One of the first actions in the seder is the ritual dipping of karpas into salty water, recalling the tears and hardships of our ancestors.

Mimouna confers on all of us the things that Pesach withheld. The sweetness of a grandmother's good wishes to her grandchildren surpasses the bitter reminiscing. Homes are festively decorated and brightly lit. Tables are laden with different foods, sweets and symbols of optimism: for spring — flowers, budding branches and boughs of greenery; for chometz — oversized challah, mounds of pastries, bowls overflowing with rising yeast and flour; for prosperity — pitchers full of the proverbial milk and honey, buttermilk, a large whole fish set on a bed of greens and carnations.

Mimouna is celebration of many things. Foremost it is a joyful leavetaking of a meaningful holiday well spent — Isrou Hag.

Secondly, Mimouna is a home-based tradition celebrating the centrality of family life to Jewish living. During the course of the evening families and neighbors exchange visits, greetings and toasts over arak, a clear and sweet liquor. For children, these open houses allow them to fill their bags to brimming with goodies. Hence, Mimouna is not only about Jewish family, but about Jewish community.

Mimouna is also about inter-community. Jews were never able to properly prepare for the festivities, since Mimouna comes when chometz preparation is not allowed. Muslim neighbors viewed this as an opportunity to ingratiate themselves with the Jews. On the eighth day of Passover, while Jews were in their synagogues or homes, Muslim men would gather flowers and greens and Muslim women would bake breads to be delivered after sunset. Arab families took this custom quite seriously and with much pride. For some it was a responsibility that had been passed on for generations. The Jews always found ways to reciprocate.

While Mimouna, with its bounty of food, drink and gregarious gatherings, may be just another Mediterranean feast, its religious essence is important to Sephardim in general and North African Jews in particular.

The origin of this custom has been obscured by time. Two popular theories both borrow from its name, Mimouna. emunah (faith).

One groups says that when G-d spoke the first of the Ten Commandments, He introduced Himself not as G-d, creator of the cosmos, nor as G-d supreme ruler of the universe, but rather by saying, "I am your G-d Who took you out of Egypt" (Shemot 20:2). In this fashion we are to perceive Him as an involved G-d, and find Him manifest all about us.

Alternately, some trace the Mimouna to a memorial to Maimonides, who passed away just after Pesach. Maimonides enjoys a singular position in Judaism due to his many and diverse accomplishments. He was a scholar, statesman, man of the sciences and medicine; but above all, he was a man of reason, something even a casual reading of his works would attest to.

Faith and rationale are arguably mutually exclusive. Faith is the innate state of one's mind, an intangible and unsubstantiated conviction arrived at after much thought and inculcation. Rationale, on the other hand, is the result of a scientific approach based on logical proof and calculation.

I like to think of my ethnic group as having successfully synthesized these two approaches in their outlook to life and religion. Together, faith and rationale don't just explain the Mimouna but also accurately describe the people that celebrate it. Sephardi psyche is a cloth woven with equal measures of faith and rationale. Yes, emphatically we have a mystical, sometimes superstitious bend. We have in our culture the veneration of the tzadik and the pious lighting of candles, but we encompass scholastic and intellectual achievement every bit as much. Sephardi pride and contribution are not limited to the creative arts of music and piyoutim, but also incorporate the philosophical and halachic fields.

Mimouna night is followed by Mimouna day, where the theme of celebrating Jewish living with gusto continues. In warmer climates it is a day for a picnic, not just a family outing but a time to recite a blessing, the one made in the spring when first seeing fruit trees in full bloom: Blessed be Hashem, Ruler of the Universe, Whose world lacks nothing and Who put into it such beauty and goodness for our pleasure.

Rabbi Yehiel Benayon is the spiritual leader of Magen David Sephardic Congregation in Toronto.

This is the traditional Piyout (poem) sung during the Mimouna. It was authored in Casablanca by Rabbi David Bouzaglo in 1903. Rabbi Bouzaglo, the 'blind Paytan,' was this generation's foremost authority on religious liturgy and himself authored and composed a great many of the tunes used by North African Jewry.

Is the U.S. really Israel's friend?

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

There is a well-worn saying that goes like this: Nations have no friends, they only have self-interests. Yet many of us would like to believe that there are some national friendships that are as real as those in private life. The events of the past few weeks have made it clear that this is not necessarily so.

Look at what is happening to the British-American relationship. It was one of those sacred cows, and it was called "special." Yet something has happened — Gerry Adams, leader of Sinn Fein, has been accorded regal treatment in the United States, much to the displeasure of the British. They are making cautious and tentative arrangements with the Irish Republican Army, but they are appalled that U.S. President Bill Clinton would give the leader of what the British describe as a longtime terrorist organization such attention and loving care. Hence the "special relationship" between the two countries has been put in jeopardy.

Another of these sacred cows — or so Jews have long believed — is the way the United States and Israel have gotten along. Israel has breen dependent on the Americans, who have responded in kind. There have been ups and downs, but the relationship really never changed.

Now comes a book by Moshe Arens, Israel's foreign minister from 1988 to 1990 and defence minister from 1990 to 1992. The American-born diplomat, whom many observers believed to be a potential prime minister himself, now lets fly a broadside attack on U.S. policy during the critical events of the Gulf War. The Bush administration was then in charge of American policy, which was not only neutral with regard to Israel's requirements, but even neglectful to the point of unfriendliness. In his book Broken Covenant, Arens traces the perfidy with which Israel was treated to James A. Baker, secretary of state to President George Bush.

No Israeli will forget what took place during the Gulf War: how Israel, a noncombatant, was attacked with missiles by Iraq, and how the United States insisted that she not defend herself. Israelis taped up their dwelling places and huddled together in bomb shelters and other secure places whenever the sirens sounded, announcing the arrival of yet another Iraqi Scud. Long proud of its ability to defend itself when necessary, Israel sat shackled at home, gas masks strapped over the faces of young and old alike, the stuffy atmosphere unbearable at times and the frustration nation-wide. Yet Israelis endured it stoically, knowing they had no other choice if they wanted to keep their relationship with the United States.

But it was all a sham, Arens asserts. The Americans knew very well that Israel could and would take its fate into its own hands and deal Iraq a serious, if not fatal blow. But Baker didn't want it that way and he insisted that Israel stand aside, lest — so the political wisdom went in those days — Israel's participation in the war should lose the United Nations its Arab support. The result was a humiliation of Israel and, even more important, an undermining of its confidence in its ability to take care of its own security.

Part of the American strategy had to do with the American administration's dislike of the Likud, Arens avers. He says they were worried about an Israel that stepped out alone when it seemed to be in its interest.

In a review in the New York Times of the Arens book, Connor Cruise O'Brien, a longtime friend and admirer of Israel, says: "The Shamir government had been given to understand that its forbearance during that great crisis would be rewarded by more considerations from America when the war was over. This did not happen. Quite the contrary."

Shortly after the war was over, it looked as if there might be new fighting between the United States and Iraq, and Israel would be exposed to more Scud missiles, which this time might contain chemical or biological components, Arens writes:

"On October 8, the Iraqis submitted a protest to the United Nations which may enter history as a record in hypocrisy: Iraq had, without provocation, launched missiles against Israel's cities, and now protested that our aircraft had entered its air space to take photographs. Iraq was joined by the United States in this protest."

O'Brien concludes, "Mr. Arens and his government had served the general interests of the West, to their own political detriment, in a time of crisis and was shabbily treated in return. Though his bitterness blemished his book, Broken Covenant is recommended reading for all serious students of Israel and its relationship with the United States. Some of the generalized conclusions, and the book's title, are exaggerated, but the detailed narrative has the ring of truth."

I am not privy to the details, but I do remember how 50 years ago, we were all heartbroken when Franklin Delano Roosevelt died, whom we Jews considered to be like our father, a true friend. Later on, history showed that this was a badly skewed view, and that Roosevelt was all too often not our friend.

It is good to remember that, whether or not Arens' assessment of United States policy is accurate, it does bear out the general thesis, adumbrated above, that nations have no friends but only self-interests.

And the winner is . . . Moses!

Now we return you to the continuing saga of the HALO Awards, with Pharoah reading the nominees for Best Supporting Actor.

The Snake, in the first ever "skin flick" in history, Eat My Apple; Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego, in that touching animal movie for the whole family, They Were Born Free, But What About Me?; Ham, in his deeply moving role as the accursed son in Barefoot in the Ark; And Goliath, in the popular adventure movie, The Harder They Fall.

May I have the papyrus, please? Well, I can sure identify with this one! The winner is — The Snake.

Special effects of biblical proportions

(A giant snake slitters up from the audience, which is now giving him a standing ovation.)

Snake: I won! I showed all you fools and suckers!

(The snake has his microphone cut off, although the six billion people watching this on television can probably guess what he says. As a group of shepherds carry the snake off, Aaron the High Priest rushes out on stage)

Aaron: Hu, er, our next award, for Best Actor, will be presented by the winner of last year's HALO for Best Supporting Actress, for her incredible transformation into a pillar of salt: a woman who has been a pillar of strength to her husband Lot for many hundreds of years — let's give a big hand to — Lot's Wife!

Lot's wife: Thanks so much, Aaron. For a Second Banana, you're such a great guy — but then, look at the Baldwin boys! (She turns to read haltingly from the cue cards, in the shape of the Ten Commandments). And I'd now like to announce the winner of the much-coveted — even though we really shouldn't covet, should we? — HALO for Best Actor. The nominees are: Abraham, for his role in that scream of a comedy, We've All Got to Make Sacrifices; Moses, as the leader of the Hebrews in that glorious epic, Take Two Tablets and Call Me in the Morning; and Job, for his heart-breaking portrayal of a perennial loser in the tragic motion picture, You Think You've Got Problems?. The scroll, please! And the winner is ... Yes! It's Moses! Come on up, Moe!

(Moses rushes out in a white heat of anger and fury)

Moses: You didn't listen to Ha-Shem! You obeyed false gods! You built a Golden Calf! You made fun of my wife! You never stopped complaining in the desert! You never stopped egging to go back to Egypt! A plague on every single one of you!

(Moses turns to Lot's wife, Aaron, the judges off-stage and screams) Here is what I think of your G-d-Forsaken Award!

(Moses lifts the beautiful halo-shaped statuette above his head with both hands, and throws it down upon the stage, shattering it.)

Lighting and thunder fill the stage. Cameras overturn, the set collapses, and the screen goes black. (Amen.)

Rabin fights back after troubles

By Yeshayahu Anug

It is no secret that Yitzhak Rabin, one of Israel's best generals, is not a very brilliant politician and would himself not dispute it. He got the premiership twice, because his military record assured the voters that with him Israel's security would be in trusted hands.

On the first occasion in 1974, he replaced the Labor team that was punished for not having foreseen the disastrous Yom Kippur War, but he lost power to Likud three years later. As minister of defence in the government of national union (1984-1988), he was surprised by the intifadah and misunderstood the strength of this popular upheaval.

He handled it harshly and relentlessly as a security problem only and failed. But this very image of uncompromising toughness was a major factor in his comeback. It not only won him the leadership of his party from Shimon Peres but played a decisive role in his electoral victory in 1992.

During that electoral campaign and at his inauguration, he undertook to dedicate his second premiership to the search for peace by territorial compromise and promised to change the priorities of the national agenda, and he started rather well. He obtained a loan guarantee from the United States, more than doubled the budget for education, invested heavily in road construction and almost froze settlement building in the territories with the sole exception of Greater Jerusalem where development goes on.

He broke with the paralysing taboos of the past and started negotiating a peace agreement with the PLO, and despite this radical change of course, not only maintained popular support but even increased it initially.

The opposition decided that the best way to fight the prospects of territorial concessions was to demolish Rabin's security record by accusing him of betrayal. At first he appeared to be indifferent to the wild verbal excesses and the stormy demonstrations of the opposition. When murderous Islamic terrorism escalated, the rejectionists of peace exploited the nation's grief to promote their objective by waging the most ruthless campaign against the prime minister, and according to the polls, succeeded in substantially weakening the support for his government.

In part, Rabin is himself to blame for his troubles because he handled the situation ineffectively. Instead of using his well established reputation as a confidence-inspiring leader to encourage public endurance, he yielded to pressure and slowed down the implementation of the next phases of the accord with the PLO and accused it of insufficient vigilance.

Was he himself reconsidering the whole agreement with Yasser Arafat? This could have been the public impression. In any case, his reaction was interpreted as a recognition of political failure and also helped Arafat's opponents to discredit him for cooperating with Israel.

Now both Rabin and Arafat are in trouble. Both had opted for a policy of conciliation, fraught with danger but also rich in promise, yet both were stumbling and were trapped between their own bilateral agenda and their domestic opposition. To make matters worse, although they have become partners and meet frequently to remove the many obstacles to progress, they have evidently not been able to establish a suitable working relationship between themselves.

As the most important battlegrounds for both are now internal, and as their political survival has become the most urgent issue, both are adopting new tactics within their constituencies.

Arafat has now increased his efforts to foil the activities of would-be terrorists against Israel and has achieved some positive results which were recognized by Israel, but on the other hand, to maintain popularity in his own ranks, he escalated his anti-Israel rhetoric by making inflamatory speeches on the issue of Jerusalem, which promises to remain the most delicate to solve.

Rabin, for his part, is now using harsh language in his fight against the onslaughts of the Likud opposition. It seems he has finally recognized that his former indifference to its attacks were interpreted as personal weakness or, worse still, as a recognition that he himself had lost confidence in the peace agreement he had so insistently endorsed.

Holocaust rescue attempts

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Could more Jews have been saved during the Holocaust? Although 50 years have elapsed since the end of World War II, it remains an intriguing question without a satisfactory answer.

Despite this conundrum, the fact of the matter is that rescue efforts, both before and during the war, were undertaken. And unquestionably, they yielded results, though often they were too little and too late.

Prior to 1939, the most successful effort occurred in Germany, in the nest of the vipers, when thousands of German Jews were able to immigrate to Palestine in an orderly fashion with their capital. This exodus was the outcome of negotiations between Nazi Germany and the Zionist movement.

Once the war was on, the Final Solution came into play. But even during this seemingly hopeless period, Hitler's emissaries, ranging from Heinrich Himmler to Adolf Eichmann, engaged Jewish negotiators in shadowy talks. From the Jews' point of view, the talks were designed to mitigate the devastating effects of the Holocaust. For the Germans, they were potentially useful in economic and political terms.

These developments are analysed at length by Yehuda Bauer, the eminent Hebrew University historian, in his latest book, Jews for Sale: Nazi-Jewish Negotiations, 1933-1945 (Yale University Press, $30 US), a thoroughly researched but stylistically turgid volume. Apart from Germany, the bulk of his book deals with Hungary and Slovakia. He passes over the rescue of Danish and Bulgarian Jewry, since the status of these communities was not contingent on talks with the Nazis.

The basis of Germany's negotiations with the Yishuv was unambiguous. Germany wanted to get rid of its Jews, while the Zionists wished to absorb them gradually in Palestine. What was needed was an arrangement whereby the interests of both parties could be served.

In August 1933, eight months after Hitler's accession to power, the Jewish Agency of Palestine and the Ministry of Economic Affairs in Germany signed a so-called transfer agreement.

Joel Brand

Under the accord, German Jews were allowed to leave with their assets, and in return, were obliged to purchase German industrial goods. The Jewish economic boycott of Germany, initiated by American Jews, was thus broken. On the other hand, the agreement was a boon to German-Jewish emigrants and a windfall for Palestine's developing economy.

Eventually, the Nazis had second thoughts about the pact. The influence of the pro-Arab German ambassador in Iraq, and the impact of the Palestinian rebellion in Palestine (1936-1939), caused Germany to ask itself why it should support the Jews, albeit inadvertently. By 1941, Germany was no longer interested in channelling Jews to Palestine.

As Bauer makes clear, the situation in Slovakia was far more complex. Slovakia, with a fascist, pro-German government, promulgated a series of anti-Semitic decrees. Under German pressure, the Slovakians agreed to the deportation of its Jewish citizens. Some 60,000 Jews were shipped to Poland from March until October 1942.

Attempts to save the remnant were undertaken by Rabbi Michael Dov Weissmandel, an ultra-Orthodox Jew. He initiated negotiations with Dieter Wisliceny, a Nazi official, hoping that bribes would stop the deportations.

Raoul Wallenberg: savior of Hungarian Jews.

There was indeed a pause, Bauer writes, but it had no decisive impact. With Hitler's assent, Himmler, in December 1942, entered the picture. Himmler's objective was three-fold: to ransom off Jews for hard currency, to gain the release of prisoners of war and to open contacts with the Allies in order to sow divisions within their ranks.

These negotiations, insofar as Jews were concerned, were of minimal value.

One of the most fascinating but tragically unproductive rescue episodes turned on the "trucks for blood" affair in German-occupied Hungary. Prominent in this set of negotiations were Rudolf Kasztner, a journalist and left-of-centre Zionist, and Joel Brand, a Communist-turned-Zionist. According to Bauer, both were marginal figures in the Hungarian Jewish community. Yet each played an important, though ultimately futile, role in the attempt to stave off the deportation of Hungarian Jewry.

Eichmann empowered Brand to offer the Allies a tantalizing deal. In exchange for the release of approximately one million European Jews, the Germans would receive 10,000 trucks and quantities of coffee, tea and soap from the Allies.

Were the Nazis playing a double game? Probably. On the day Brand left for Istanbul, Eichmann travelled to Auschwitz to ensure it would be ready to receive the first transports from Hungary.

Brand's mission was a non-starter, if only because the Soviet Union objected. Kasztner took over, and the negotiations he conducted eventually led to a meeting between Himmler and Norbert Masur, a Swedish national and a representative of the World Jewish Congress. But the net effect of their encounter was insubstantial.

In concluding, Bauer reminds the reader that, in spite of its tactical interest in negotiating with its Jewish enemies, Nazi Germany remained strategically true to its goal of exterminating European Jewry.

* * *

Where Brand and Kasztner failed, Raoul Wallenberg — the Swedish diplomat — succeeded brilliantly.

Wallenberg, who disappeared 50 years ago, never to be seen again, is credited with saving the lives of approximately 100,000 Hungarian Jews.

He is the subject of Kati Marton's biography, Wallenberg: Missing Hero (Fitzhenry & Whiteside, $15.95), which was originally published in 1982 and is now available in paperback. It remains one of the finest accounts of the Wallenberg saga.

Lest we forget, Wallenberg was dispatched to Budapest by the War Refugee Board, a U.S. government agency established in 1944 to save Jews imperilled by the Nazis.

He was chosen because he was a man of passionate conviction and good organizational skills.

It should be noted, as Marton does, that the Swedish legation in the Hungarian capital had been giving out protective documents to Jews before Wallenberg appeared on the scene. These passports exempted the recipients from wearing the humiliating yellow star and gave them the right to settle in Sweden.

But thousands more wanted these passes, and Wallenberg — one of whose ancestors had been Jewish — saw to it that they got them. Forming a special section within the legation, and recruiting a staff of 400 to help him, he set out on his humanitarian task.

Circumstances were right. When Wallenberg began, Hungary was still in the hands of non-Nazis (notably Admiral Miklos Horthy), though Nazi elements sat in the cabinet. (It was not until the autumn of 1944 that the Arrow Cross, the Hungarian Nazi militia, replaced Horthy.)

The Wallenberg mystery

As Marton tells it, Wallenberg was a smooth operator, capable of sweet-talking his putative enemies into delivering vital concessions.

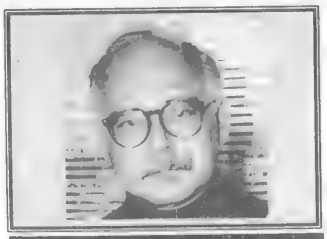
Elisabeth Kemeny, the wife of Hungary's foreign minister in the fascist Szalasi regime, browbeat her husband into honoring the passports bestowed on Jews by Wallenberg.

Paul Szalai, a veteran police officer, gave Wallenberg the precise details of the comings and goings of various Arrow Cross and German factions and arranged for policemen to guard the increasingly besieged ghetto.

Marton claims that the Russians, the liberators of Budapest in January 1945, were mystified by Wallenberg's account of his activities on behalf of Jews. And they were convinced he was an American agent, given his ties with the War Refugee Board.

She maintains that Wallenberg was alive until the mid-1970s, though a recent book by Pavel Sudoplanov, a former KGB agent, disputes this thesis. In any event, Soviet officialdom stuck to its story that Wallenberg died in prison in 1947 and that his body was cremated.

Archival material uncovered since the demise of the Soviet Union in 1991 offers no new, startling clues about Wallenberg's fate. In all probability, he is dead. But to Hungarian Jews, his spirit lives on.



Mideast Analysis

An elusive Syrian visa

I should have been so lucky.

Some months ago, Irving Abella, president of the Canadian Jewish Congress, was granted a visa to visit Syria. But two days before his scheduled departure, the Syrians revoked his visa.

I didn't even get that far. When I applied for a Syrian visa, I was met by an implacable wall of bureaucratic silence.

Late last year, I signed up for an 18-day package tour of Syria and Jordan. I had no reason to believe I would not go. I had already visited Syria once, and I figured that Syria would be ready to receive Jewish visitors now that it was engaged in peace talks with Israel.

I submitted my application in early January, expecting to get my visa well in advance of my Feb. 21 departure date. (Jordan would be no problem. I intended to apply for a Jordanian visa as soon as I received my stamped passport from the Syrian Consulate in Montreal.)

Not long afterward, my travel agent informed me that the Syrians wanted samples of my writing and two copies of The Canadian Jewish News. I immediately knew why. I had listed "journalist" as my occupation and Jewish as my religion.

In a fax to the consulate, I explained that although the primary purpose of my trip was tourism, I wished to spend several days, before the start of my organized tour, gathering material for articles about Syria.

Ten days passed. I called the Syrian honorary consul in Montreal, Farris Attar, and sent off faxes to Syria's embassy in Washington. (Syria does not have an embassy in Ottawa).

I waited patiently, but to no avail. I phoned the Syrians in Washington. I spoke to a woman named Mona, who identified herself as the secretary of Souad al-Ayoubi, a diplomat in charge of visas. I told her all I wanted was a simple Yes or No answer. She empathized, but added that my visa request had been forwarded to Damascus for special handling.

I called Attar, who seemed genuinely sorry that I was being treated so shabbily. He assured me that the delay was caused by my status as a journalist, not by my religion. In the first week of February, I called Mona again. She suggested I cancel my trip. I said I couldn't, since I had already paid for it. Hearing that, she urged me to get in touch with the Ministry of Information in Damascus.

But first I contacted Rodney Moore of the Department of Foreign Affairs in Ottawa. He said I should call Talab Kadi Amin, an official in Damascus responsible for issuing visas to reporters. I called him and subsequently faxed him a letter, after being told that the Canadian embassy in Damascus was working on my case.

Amid these exchanges, the Syrian consulate returned my passport and original visa application without explanation.

The long and short of it is that no visa was ever issued. I went to Florida instead.

Rabbinic Reflections

By
RABBI MARTIN J. BERMAN

Each day of Passover we recite the Hallel. However, unlike Sukkot, when we recite the complete Hallel every day, on the intermediate days of Passover we recite only an abbreviated version.

The Shulchan Aruch instructs that each day of chol hamo'ed and the last two days of yom tov we read the Hallel, skipping part as on Rosh Chodesh. The Mishna Berurah explains: "Because on the seventh day of Passover the Egyptians drowned."

The midrash tells us that when the Egyptians were drowning, the ministering angels wanted to recite a song. The Holy One, praised be He, said: "The work of My hands is drowning in the sea, and you would recite a song?"

The Mishna Berurah then continues: "Since we do not recite [the full Hallel] on the seventh day, perforce on chol hamo'ed we also do not recite it so that it should not be better than the last day of yom tov."

Rabbi Johanan said in the Talmud: G-d does not rejoice at the downfall of the wicked. Similarly, one explanation given for why we spill a drop of wine from our cups as we recite the 10 plagues is "Israel's cup of joy can not be full if Israel's triumph involves suffering even to its enemies."

During the chol hamo'ed period there is a Torah reading each day. On the second day, we read, "If you come across your enemy's ox or donkey wandering astray, you must certainly return it to him. If you see the donkey of him who hates you lying under its burden you shall forbear passing him by, you must certainly help him release it." The Torah does not tell us we must come to the aid of our friend. It tells us in clear cut terms that we must come to the aid of our enemy, a person who hates us.

We are required to aid enemies in need. We are not required to love our enemies, but we are told that we have an obligation to show respect and to offer aid.

Torah goes even farther than that. "Our rabbis taught: It says, 'You shall not hate your brother in your heart.' Since an individual might think, 'I must not strike him or beat him or curse him [but I may hate him],' therefore it says in your heart."

It is clearly asking a lot to say that we must not hate our fellow Jew, that we must be prepared to help our enemy, but that is clearly the way of Torah. We may not always be capable of such an attitude, but we must always try to meet the demands of the Torah.

We see in the world today the failure to recognize our responsibility to respect other people. Throughout the world, we still see terrible cruelty and horror inflicted upon other people, simply because they are other. People had hoped that in the aftermath of World War II and the Holocaust the world would be a different kind of place. They were wrong. Senseless and vicious hatred is still with us, still claiming its victims. We are all G-d's children, but you would not know it by the hate and fear that exist because of differences between people.

There is an important message to learn from the fact that we do not say the complete Hallel on most of Passover. We are all, all of us, G-d's children. It is about time that we began to act as if we truly understand that.

Rabbi Martin Berman is the spiritual leader of Shaar Shalom Synagogue in Thornhill.

Toronto scores in Bible contest

MONTREAL — Montreal came first in one category, but Toronto won virtually all other prizes in the annual National Bible Contest, held this year in Montreal.

Bialik High School student Jill Cracower of Montreal took first place in the grades 9-13 category.

The other winners were Torontonians. Laura Erdman, a student at United Synagogue Day School, was first for grades 7-8, while Timothy Braude, who goes to Associated Hebrew Day School, won the grades 5-6 event.

Henry David, a student at Bet Sefer Solel, finished first in the supplementary school division.

Cracower and Erdman will compete at the International Bible Contest next year in Israel. Braude and David won $500 subsidies towards a future Israel trip.

The two-day contest, which alternates between Montreal and Toronto, brought over 170 students culled from 450 nationwide to Bialik High School.

Victoria, B.C., sent a record eight participants under coach Fred Nudel.

The finals took place at the Beth Zion Synagogue on the theme of Jewish leadership.

The format moved away this year from dry questions to video, music and dramatizations.

The contest aims to present Bible study "as an attractive, engaging and fun activity," organizers said, and to allow students from across Canada to meet.

The contest this year was coordinated and co-sponsored by the Jewish Education Council, the Canadian Zionist Federation, the Jewish National Fund of Canada and the Toronto Board of Jewish Education.

WISDOM OF THE AGES

If I try to be like him, who will be like me?

"NACHAS" BY MIRIAM LANAU

Where is our home

By BARUCH DYM

He really believed this spot was the end of the world, and, should he go past the soldier with the gun, he would fall off the edge.

For him this displaced persons camp, circled by barbed wire, was the last place in the world. Where they would go from here he didn't know. Things were too confusing. Sure, his sister had told him the soldier standing guard was a good soldier, protecting them from the ever-pursuing Germans, but he kept away from him. He never smiled.

GUEST VOICES

Their arrival was already blurred in his mind. He remembered a long line of people walking on a moonless night, branches scratching his face, huge shadows running back and forth, telling them to keep quiet. Once he fell and strong hands picked him up and a rough voice told him to keep on, to act like a man. At dawn the shadows disappeared and the fugitives were across the border.

Food was scarce in the displaced persons camp, and he was always hungry. Now and then, his sister came clutching a package. On these occasions they chose an isolated place and sitting on the ground they ate everything they had. She never forgot to explain that it came from the family. Once she became angry with him when he asked, while wolfing down some chocolate, "We have a family?" She cried and shook him violently by the shoulders. "Of course we have a family, we have a father and mother and uncles and aunts and after the war, we'll go back to them."

He looked at her in surprise. She had never mentioned any of these things. That night he dreamt of a smiling woman handing out cake to children, but whenever his turn came up, she would disappear.

Well-dressed women visited the camp and looked over some of the children. Two of them approached the boy and started to question him. He was bewildered. Then his sister suddenly appeared and put her arm around him. Very earnestly she explained to the ladies that they had a family and couldn't go anywhere because as soon as the war ended they would rejoin their parents. The ladies didn't say a word; they just patted her on the head and left without looking back.

One day suddenly exploded in excitement. The adults were kissing each other with tears streaming down their faces. He became afraid they would have to move again. But his sister explained that people were crying from joy. The war had ended and everybody was going home. "Where is our home?" he asked. But she didn't get angry, she smiled and he noticed she too had tears in her eyes.

It was night when they left the camp for the train station. The train moved slowly as if weary from its journey or from the heavy load it carried. At a junction it stopped to enable workers on the tracks to move out of the way. Like lightning the word spread aboard the train that these workers were German prisoners of war. Thousands of eyes stared out as the train moved slowly past the working men. No one spoke.

As the train gathered speed, the head of a little girl leaned out of a window and a high-pitched voice cried angrily in the night "Sale Boche, Sale Boche (Dirty Germans)," and then the train was gone, leaving smoke and the echo of a child's voice.

Skilled Kitchener craftsman creates two Torah arks

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Bob Lyman retired from the jewelry business in Kitchener, he refused to just sit around.

Instead, he honed his formidable cabinetmaking and decorating skills — wallpapering, building, painting, upholstering. He even built his own swimming pool.

Recently he branched out into building, of all things, portable Torah arks.

Linda Berman, a teacher at the Kitchener-Waterloo Hebrew School, knowing his skill as a craftsman, suggested he build an Aron Kodesh that she could use as a teaching tool in her senior kindergarten class.

Using the ark in the Beth Jacob Synagogue as a model, he built not one but two, one to hold a 7½-inch sefer Torah and a larger one for a 22- or 24-inch scroll.

The cabinets are made of ½-inch birch plywood, with pine decorations, all stained and varnished.

Inside, a blue velvet curtain, decorated with gold embroidery by Lyman's daughter, Sharon, slides on an ingenious arrangement made of a coat hanger covered with water piping.

"If they want to change the curtain, say for a white one around Rosh Hashanah, they just have to take out three screws in the back, change the curtain, and put everything back together," he said.

Magen davids in a darker stain were cut out using the intricate movements of a very fine scroll saw, whose seven-inch blade, Lyman explained, is as thin as two threads.

For the lions above the doors, he found a pattern at a tombstone maker. "The lettering I did myself."

The 76-year-old was born in Regina, one of 16 children. After spending the war years in England, he came to Toronto, where he met his wife, Lillian, on a blind date.

"I proposed on the third date," he related with a twinkle. "We were married six months later. I can say we have been proudly married for 48 years."

The family moved to Kitchener in the early 1950s. Lyman, his wife, their four children and 12 grandchildren still live there.

Any more Aron Kodeshes in the future? Well, he says with a sidelong glance, it all depends on what comes up.

Former JCC Valley branch now open for business

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Game on.

Although it doesn't officially open until April 23, the nets are up and the Valley Tennis and Swim Club is open for business.

Last year at this time, that was certainly not a foregone conclusion. Back then, the club was known as the Northeast Valley branch of the Jewish Community Centre (JCC) and its future hinged on the financial health of that near-bankrupt institution.

Attendance at the Valley branch was down, as members bided their time, waiting to see whether the JCC could avoid bankruptcy. The JCC narrowly averted that fate when the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto agreed to bail it out.

Part of the bailout plan included a restructuring of the JCC which will see the Valley, Bathurst and Bloor Street branches each become independent non-profit corporations.

As part of the plan, the Valley Club will assume $1 million of the JCC's $10 million bank debt. Members are being asked to pay a $200 surcharge on top of their $545 adult tennis membership fee or $285 swim fee (down from $375) to help pay down the debt, said director Ted Thompson.

The Valley Club's interim management committee anticipates that membership could rebound to 900 in 1995 from a low of 750 in 1994. With those numbers, 75 per cent of the former branch's debt could be paid off in five years, said Allan Wexler, chair of the interim committee.

The new club is also considering other fundraising plans, such as casino nights, bingos and perhaps a dinner and dance, added Thompson.

Members haven't been reluctant to pay the surcharge, Thompson said. "The response has been very positive. Despite the levy, the members are happy we're open and in control of our own destiny."

Thompson said that while a full programming menu is still being developed, the summer tennis and swim programs are ready to go "full force."

Sixteen tennis courts will be open as well as the 25-yard swimming pool, a children's wading area and playground.

Programming highlights include:

- an under-14 tournament for boys and girls, to be held under the auspices of the Ontario Tennis Association the weekend of May 19.
- a "junior challenge" tennis program with free lessons, barbecues and games against other clubs.
- teen dances.
- a masters' tournament in July for players over 35.
- a family picnic day to be held in June.

The season kicks off with an open house on April 30 when the Valley Club will dress itself up and invite the community to see what's on offer for the summer, Thompson said.

Lung cancer cases on rise among women

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Lung cancer incidence and deaths in women "have gone through the roof," says the incoming president of the Canadian Cancer Society, Ontario division.

Oncologist Dr. Neil Iscoe says new cases of lung cancer among women are growing far more rapidly than in men because of the number of young girls taking up smoking.

"This is a totally preventable disease, but we haven't got the resources to fight the advertising campaigns of the tobacco companies," Iscoe told an audience at the Bernard Betel Centre April 4.

Statistics show that cancer deaths in general are flattening out, while deaths from bowel, bladder, cervical, Hodgkin's and testicular cancers are actually falling.

Iscoe, who works at the Toronto-Bayview Regional Cancer Centre at Sunnybrook Hospital, spoke about a number of cancers, including breast and prostate, the most frequently diagnosed cancer in men between 65 and 79.

He expressed reservations about the value of a blood test for breast cancer, but said yearly pap smears for women of all ages can help reduce cervical cancer deaths.

Iscoe could give no definite opinion on whether car pollution is an important cause of cancer, but said mammography radiation has not been shown to cause cancer.

Barb Labovitz of the Ontario Breast Screening Program said that if only 70 per cent of women went for a mammogram each year, the lives of 300 women would be saved.

Pasternak to run in Wilson Heights

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

Sam Pasternak

TORONTO — The provincial riding of Wilson Heights will be one to watch in the next election, as two veteran Jewish community figures will go head to head.

Earlier this month, Sam Pasternak, national commander of the 1,300-member Jewish War Veterans of Canada, won the Progressive Conservative nomination in the riding, defeating architect Barry Cline by a 3-1 margin.

That means Pasternak, 70, will face Liberal MPP Monte Kwinter in the election.

Kwinter, 64, has held the seat since 1985, when he defeated Tory David Rotenberg. He served in several cabinet positions under former Premier David Peterson.

Kwinter is a founding president of the Toronto Regional Council of B'nai Brith Canada.

In additional to being active in the Royal Canadian Legion, General Wingate branch, Pasternak served as Toronto Post Commander of the Jewish War Veterans for 12 years. He became national commander in 1993.

During World War II, he served with the Royal Canadian Air Force in the Northwest Staging Route, based in Watson Lake, Yukon.

Known for his tough stand on law and order, Pasternak is founder and chair of the Shomrim, whose volunteer members assist in security for visiting Israeli dignitaries and at other Jewish events.

In the mid-'60s, he helped set up the N-3 Fighters Against Racial Hatred, in response to the rising Canadian neo-Nazi movement at the time.

Two years ago, he was named honorary deputy police chief by then Metro Police Chief William McCormack.

Wilson Heights has the highest concentration of Jewish residents of any Ontario riding — nearly 50 per cent.

The New Democrats have yet to choose a candidate in the riding or set a date for a nomination meeting.

Windsor JCC to be renovated

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Windsor Jewish Community Centre (WJCC) is getting a facelift.

The renovation project begins in November, when workers will begin the modernization of the downtown landmark. The $2.2-million project calls for installing a new facade and modernization of the building's administrative offices.

A key element of the upgrade will be improvement of the centre's physical fitness facilities, with the addition of new aerobics equipment, such as stairmasters, treadmills, stationary bicycles and rowing machines, said WJCC executive director Allen Juris.

Juris said the WJCC was built in 1958 and the centre's physical fitness areas are "seriously antiquated."

While known primarily for its delivery of social and cultural services, the new WJCC will hopefully attract more members looking for a workout, Juris said.

Fundraisers have begun soliciting contributions towards the renovation, and the campaign was given a boost recently when JobsOntario awarded a grant of $676,000 towards the project. The WJCC has already received half the government money, with the remainder to be forwarded as the work progresses.

"We have a fair portion of the [remaining $1.6 million] already in pledges and cash," Juris said. "In fact, the majority of the money is already in. We are a very financially conservative institution. We're financially solvent."

The WJCC is located at 1641 Ouellette, in the heart of Windsor and serves a Jewish community of 1,800. It is only about a mile and a half from the city's business core.

The facility's strength is in providing youth, teen and family programming and "a total package of services," Juris said.

The WJCC is the site of an eight-week summer day camp (Camp Yomee) for 150 kids; it runs the Hebrew Collegiate Institute for about 30 teenagers; and it is the site of a seniors' apartment building that houses 80.

The WJCC offers programming to mark important events like Israel Independence Day, Chanukah, Lag b'Omer and Tu b'Shevat. It also plays a leading role in the integration of recent immigrants, having taken in about 60 families in the last five years, Juris said.

Every Jewish organization in Windsor, from Ort to Hadassah to B'nai Brith uses the centre for meetings.

The WJCC's building committee is chaired by Harriet Whiteman, immediate past president of the Windsor Jewish Federation. Gerald Freed and Alan Orman are campaign chairs.

Cognitive rehabilitation focus of Rotman conference

TORONTO — Nearly 400 researchers, physicians and therapists from Canada, the United States and England gathered recently for the fifth annual conference of the Rotman Research Institute of Baycrest Centre.

The two-day conference focused on Cognitive Rehabilitation: Advances in the rehabilitation of acute and age-related disorders.

Speakers reviewed current theories about how people recover from brain injury and cope with progressive illnesses such as Alzheimers and Parkinsons diseases, which attack the brain and often lead to serious deficits in memory, language and behavior.

"Each year billions of dollars are spent worldwide on cognitive rehabilitation, yet there is still no valid theory guiding this intensive endeavor," said Dr. Ian Robertson, of the Applied Psychology Unit of the Medical Research Council in Cambridge, Eng.

Recent research has shown that the brain retains its "plasticity" — the ability of brain cells to grow — until after age 85, according to Dr. Paul Coleman, a professor at the University of Rochester in New York.

Studies show that memory-impaired people who learn to use memory aids such as diaries, calendars, tape recorders and watch alarms are more likely to live independently than those who don't.

Device resembles a pager

Psychologist Barbara Wilson said such memory aids are becoming extremely sophisticated. Wilson, who is with the Medical Research Council in Cambridge, Eng., told the conference about a new device called NeuroPage.

The device, invented by the engineer father of a brain-injured son, resembles a pager. It is programmed to beep or vibrate regularly. Messages are then flashed on a small screen, reminding the person to take medicine, call home, or go to an appointment.

Dr. Ronald Stein, professor of psychology, Rutgers University, presented research, based on experiments with rats, suggesting that gender and hormones may play a role in recovery from traumatic brain injury.

"It's been noted that women with brain injury seem to do better than men, but we didn't know why," he said. "We wondered if female hormones might play a role."

He found that progesterone seems to reduce brain swelling or edema, which is common after injury and is thought to play a role in causing permanent brain damage.

The conference was preceded by a one-day workshop, organized by the Baycrest Psychology Department, on practical cognitive rehabilitation treatment techniques.

Caregivers must learn how to minimize what therapists call "excessive disabilities" — reversible deficits more disabling than primary disability. "These are often related to emotional difficulties and environmental factors," said Dr. Dmytro Rewilak, a Baycrest psychologist.

For example, if a cognitively impaired person asks repetitive questions, caregivers might interpret that this was being done to annoy them or attract attention when, in fact, the behavior is a direct result of memory loss.

"The person may simply not recall that he already asked the question," said Rewilak.

Peace process permanent, Israeli ambassador states

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — Israel will never go back to war, said Israeli Ambassador David Ben-Dov at a community meeting sponsored by the Victoria Combined Jewish Appeal.

"We will not break off the peace process," he said.

Ben-Dov is a veteran Israeli diplomat who joined the Foreign Ministry in 1956. He has served in the United States, Australia and has been a senior member of Israel's permanent mission to the United Nations.

Ben-Dov said there has been a remarkable, positive change of attitude by Arab countries towards Israel in the UN in the past five years. "We were isolated back in the late '80s. Now, it's a different picture." He attributed this to the 1991 Madrid peace conference.

Israel now has missions in such Arab states as Morocco, Tunisia and in several of the smaller Persian Gulf countries, he said, as well as potential trading partners in China and India.

The ambassador said great progress has been made in its relations with Jordan. Israel is providing water, which Jordan needs desperately, has hooked up the electrical grids of the two countries and is helping develop a desalinization program. So many Israeli tourists are expected in Jordan during Passover that Jordanian tourist officials are concerned whether they can handle all of them.

As for the Palestinians, Ben-Dov said, Israel has agreed they must control their own domestic affairs, but not as a state. If plans proceed as scheduled, the Palestinian-Israeli borders will be in place by 1999 and there is no chance the Palestinians can "swallow up" Israel. "It's out of the question," he said.

He predicted an autonomous Palestinian area will be federated with Jordan.

UCS strike angers parents

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Striking teachers at the three campuses of United Congregational Schools (UCS) could receive a counter-proposal this week, say officials involved in the three-week-old strike.

But the work stoppage has angered and frustrated parents of the 400 children enrolled in kindergarten through Grade 7, who say they have been left in the lurch.

The strike has shut down afternoon and Sunday morning classes at Beth David and Beth Emeth synagogues and at Westminster Public School in Thornhill.

Ten UCS teachers walked off the job suddenly on April 2 in a dispute that centres around severance packages, job security and sick leave credits.

The teachers have been without a contract for three years. Last February, they won a 4.5 per cent salary increase over three years, but now say they are willing to forego that in return for a deal on severance.

Efraim Bagola, president of the Federation of Teachers in Hebrew Schools, told The CJN that last June, six UCS teachers were laid off with no severance, and that in once case, a teacher was docked a day's pay for taking a sick day.

He said the UCS board has been "rigid" on the issues and has yet to come up with a counter-proposal to an offer from the teachers to spread out severance payments over two years instead of one.

Bagola estimates a severance package would cost between $45,000 and $50,000.

He said some UCS teachers work full time and do not view their jobs as income supplemenents.

"Every effort" has been made to accommodate the teachers, Jonathan Miller, co-chair of the UCS board, told The CJN last week.

Miller said "nothing is nonnegotiable based on principle, but it's simply a matter of funds."

He said the schools' sources of funding, outside of tuition, have been cut back and called it "a shame" that the Toronto Board of Jewish Education does not fund supplementary classes.

He said parents want a quick end to the strike because of uncertainty over graduation. Miller said a counter-proposal to the teachers' offers could come during chol hamo'ed.

Bagola said an April 9 meeting between the board and some parents left parents angry at the board. And he disputed the suddenness of the walkout, saying parents were warned in a letter last month of a potential strike.

But Barry Goldman, who has two children in the UCS system, said the strike has left many parents feeling that teachers acted "in a wholly unprofessional and inappropriate manner."

Goldman said teachers have lost the respect of both parents and students and that the strike has cast doubt on plans for next year.

Moroccan king to visit Canada

By ELIAS LEVY
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Before the end of 1995, King Hassan II of Morocco will make an official visit to Canada and meet with the Moroccan Jewish communities in Quebec and Ontario.

He recently made this announcement to some 20 representatives of the Canadian Moroccan Jewish community, who met with him at the Hotel Plaza in New York, during his official visit to the United States.

The meeting was chaired by Joseph Benarroch, president of the Federation Sepharade du Canada (FSC). The Quebec delegation consisted of about 15 Sephardi community leaders, including Joseph Gabay, president of the Communaute Sepharade du Quebec (CSQ), while the Ontario delegation of seven was led by Simon Keslassy, president of the Moroccan Jewish community of Toronto.

King Hassan II said in his talk that he has not yet visited his Jewish countrymen living here, because, "I was sincerely hoping to visit you in Canada. But taking into account the fact that the country is on the verge of a political battle, and because our relations with the Canadian government are excellent, I preferred to put off the trip to avoid embarrassment. I did, however, inform the Canadian authorities that I would make the visit before the end of the year, God willing."

The king also told the CSQ leaders he will make a personal contribution to the building fund for the new wing of the Ecole Maimonide of Montreal, which will be named Pavillon Mohammed V.

In response to the wish expressed by the Sephardi community of Quebec to twin the Jewish General Hospital in Montreal with a Moroccan hospital, the king suggested that the partnership be established with a Moroccan children's hospital which specializes in the treatment of complex illnesses.

Holocaust survivors, Righteous Gentile honored

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The State of Israel last week used the third annual Ontario government reception in honor of Holocaust survivors to pay tribute to the most recent of the Righteous Among the Nations.

With Ontario Premier Bob Rae and Jewish community leaders present, Israeli consul general in Toronto, Dror Zeigerman, presented the Righteous designation to Margit Hedley of London, Ont. for helping save the lives of eight Jews during World War II.

As well, Ontario Citizenship Minister Elaine Ziemba presented 11 citations to Holocaust survivors in recognition of their contributions to the province.

And to mark the 50th anniversary of the end of the war and the liberation of Europe's death camps, Rae proclaimed 1995 the Year of the Flame "to help ensure that we in Ontario do not forget the innocent men, women and children who lost their lives because they were Jewish."

Hedley, now 72, joined the world's 6,000 other Righteous Among the Nations for having sheltered eight Jews in her Budapest apartment during the Nazi occupation of Hungary.

The designation honors non-Jews who risked their lives to save Jews during the war. It is granted by Israel's Supreme Court after extensive research and witness statements from the rescued.

Hedley's first husband was a Hungarian army officer stationed in Poland during the war. He smuggled a Jewish couple, Alexander and Lucy Balicki, from the Polish town of Boryalo to Debrecen in Hungary.

The couple was taken by Hedley, then just 22, to a Budapest guest house in February 1944. The next month, the Nazis invaded Hungary and Hedley hid the Poles in her small flat.

Soon, she also hid the couples' other relatives, who made their way to Budapest. Despite the meagre war rations of the day, Hedley used her own money to buy food for the eight Poles.

Hedley told The CJN that the Polish Jews were so well hidden that even her mother, a frequent visitor to the apartment, did not know they were there.

The Poles remained hidden until January, 1945, when Budapest was liberated by Russian troops. The Balickis now live in Australia.

Asked why she risked her life to hide Jews under the noses of the Nazis and the pro-Nazi Hungarian gendarmes, Hedley shrugged. "If you can help, you do," she said, adding that in those tense 10 months, she slept with a revolver under her pillow.

Hedley was awarded a certificate and specially-struck medal. She was joined at the ceremony by her husband David and their children.

Zeigerman stressed that terrorist incidents, like the one on April 9 in which seven Israeli soldiers and two civilians were killed by a bomb in the Gaza Strip, "will not be allowed to continue."

Greetings were also brought by Liberal MPP Monte Kwinter and Tory MPP Charles Harnick, as well as from Joel Dimitry and Miriam Gelbloom, co-chairs of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, the event's co-sponsor.

In his remarks, Rae recalled his 1990 visit to the Lithuanian village of Zidikai, where his wife's mother and grandmother had been born.

After he returned, he received a package of photographs of every Jewish gravestone in the town's cemetery, an emotional Rae recalled.

Ziemba presented scrolls to Jack Kuper, a producer and writer; philanthropist Leslie Dan; author and professor Andre Stein; Holocaust educator Anita Ekstein; Rabbi Erwin Schild; Sigmund Reiser, an insurance executive; businesswoman Marsha Bielak; and Michael Rosenberg, a community volunteer.

Honored together were Henry and Helen Rosenbaum; Saul and Toby Feldberg; and Morris and Malka Edelstein.

Ontario

Tomorrow there'll be twice as many good reasons why we're introducing Neighbours today.

Thanks to the great strides made in modern medicine, the number of people over 85 will more than double in the next 15 years.

As Ontario's population grows older, more and more people will rely on in-home services. Services like nursing, meal programs, physiotherapy and homemaking.

Seniors, people with physical disabilities and others want the choice of staying in their own homes. But our current system simply won't meet the demand.

What could be more comforting than being cared for in familiar surroundings? On a street you know. Around people you love. Surrounded by those things that are so much part of your life.

We need to make sure today that in-home services will be available tomorrow. That's why we're introducing Neighbours.

Neighbours is a community approach to home and health services for independent living. For the first time, a full range of services will be available with one phone call in communities all across the province.

Neighbours is planned and managed by elected volunteers from your own community. They are people who live in the community and understand it. There are no government appointees on the board.

Whether you're someone who relies on in-home services, a concerned relative or friend, a caregiver or someone who would simply like to help, we want you to know all about Neighbours.

Or if you would simply like to get involved in Ontario's community approach to long-term care, call one of the telephone numbers below.

It is time to stop ignoring the shrieks of "Kill the Jews".

It is time to tell Arafat that he cannot continue to speak of peace while praising the suicide bombers as "martyrs".

The writing has been on the wall for some time now, for all of those who do not wear blinkers.

The fundamental principles of the Peace Accords were ignored by the Arabs from day one:

* the terrorism never stopped
* the PLO Covenant, calling for the destruction of Israel was never rescinded
* peaceful co-existence never took place
* confidence building died a still-born death

The Oslo Peace Accords did not call for building yet another Arab State, but merely for limited autonomy for the Arabs, and Israel's sovereignty over the remaining land, including international boundaries.

Above all, there was to be peace, and peaceful co-existence.

In view of the above, as well as other historical facts and international law, it was incongruous to hear the Minister of Environment, immediately following the terrorist atrocity, call for the removal of Israelis from certain areas instead of offering additional protection.

In most other countries it would be the terrorists who would be removed!

Limited autonomy does not give the Arabs the right to demand removal of Jewish residents from any areas of their ancestral home.

Almost all Arab countries have already been made Judenrein. If Israelis have no rights to live in Judea and Samaria, where will it end?!

Recently there were some rumours that electrified fences will go up around Jewish "settlements" in Judea and Samaria when the Israeli army will be redeployed!

How can anyone think of redeployment - the second stage of the Peace Accords - in view of all the breaches by the Arabs of the first stage of the Peace Accords?!

And how dare anyone suggest putting electrified fences around Jewish towns to pacify a deadly enemy, after Auschwitz.

We would hope - Never Again.

We also hope that countries, who count themselves among Israel's friends, would stop pushing Israel towards committing - what amounts to, national suicide. Even Resolution 242 of the UN called for secure and defensible borders for all nations in the region, including Israel. Giving away land for a fake peace will leave Israel vulnerable with indefensible borders - and the Arabs encouraged to wage yet another war of aggression.

Jewish Journal hopes to make TV debut

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Italians have it; so do the Portuguese. The East Indians, the Chinese, even the newly arrived Russian community, without two kopeks to rub together, have one, too.

So why doesn't the long-established Jewish community have its own television show?

That's a question that's been nagging at Doris Epstein for more than 10 years. The airwaves are full of ethnic and religiously based programming, but the Jewish community is conspicuous by its absence, she contends.

A few months ago, the energetic freelance writer, producer and psychotherapist decided to take the bull by the horns and, along with her partner Tamara Ushakova, produced a pilot episode of a half-hour Jewish program.

The magazine-style show, titled Jewish Journal, features songstress Theresa Tova, a segment on Yiddish, a d'var Torah by Rabbi Mark Dratch, an interview with theatre impressario David Mirvish, a Hebrew lesson with Prof. Leo Davids and a pre-packaged segment from Israel called Jerusalem on-Line.

The pilot has impressed programmers at Vision TV, the cable network that airs programs reflecting Canada's faith communities. Vision, which reaches six million households nationwide, is ready to open up a regular weekly time-slot for a quality Jewish program such as the one proposed by Epstein, said Richard Landau, executive producer, Mosaic programs for Vision. "[A Jewish program] is a very high priority," he said.

Epstein says her goal is "to reflect the entire community from left to right, Orthodox and Reform. We want it to be inclusive of all strands of Judaism in Canada."

Such a program would help "unify us and hold us together

"The Jewish community should have its own voice," said Ushakova, a businesswoman who was born in Tbilisi, Georgia. "It's like the community doesn't exist on TV."

As popular culture becomes increasingly video-oriented and children read less than their parents, it's important for the Jewish community to employ "the most powerful medium ... There is no positive image of Jews and Israel on television," Ushakova believes.

Epstein suggests that a Jewish program will solidify Jewish identity and educate Jews and non-Jews about the community. "It fills any parameter you can think of to stop assimilation and heighten Jewish identity," she said.

Landau concurs. In addition to informing non-Jews about the Jewish people, such a program could serve to link Jews in isolated communities with those in larger centres, he said.

The community leaders with whom she has discussed the show support its concept, Epstein said.

Doris Epstein (right) and Tamara Ushakova.

So what's preventing the Jewish Journal from making its debut on the air?

"We have to raise the money for production," Epstein said.

"We need $100,000 for 13 shows," Ushakova specified.

The two have put together a four-person sales team hoping to sell advertising time on the show. They have also approached the Jewish community seeking help, but while they have received moral support, it hasn't been translated into dollars and cents.

Sheldon Maerov, executive director of the Council of Jewish Federations (CJF) for Canada, said Epstein is preparing a formal funding proposal that will be presented at the CJF meeting in June. "I'll make them aware that there is now a proposal and alert the federations and ask their direction on it," he said.

But in light of the Jewish communities' financial needs, "the prognosis for funding this year is poor," he added.

Dermatologist still a leader 50 years later

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Toronto dermatologist Dr. Ricky Kanee Schachter didn't listen when she was told over 50 years ago there was no place in medicine for a Jewish woman.

It's a good thing she didn't listen, because she spearheaded the 19,900-sq.ft. dermatology teaching centre at Women's College Hospital that opened in 1991, established the Psoriasis Education and Research Centre in 1976, a Canadian first, and was the first woman president of the Canadian Dermatology Association.

"There hasn't been another one since," Schachter notes wryly.

In February, Schachter received the Women's Dermatologic Society Rose Hirschler Award for her contributions to medicine and for enhancing the role of women in the field of dermatology.

While Schachter, who retired from the faculty at the University of Toronto Medical School but still keeps up a practice, acknowledges things are much better for women in medicine than they were in 1945, she says they still have to contend with "a glass ceiling, or floor or wall."

Individual women may strive and be successful in medicine, the 76-year-old says, "but this doesn't really open the door for other women, except as a role model. How many women are full professors or deans of medical schools?"

She credits much of her success to her family, her parents who supported her ("my mother felt women should have a skill, and should put back into society what society gave them") and especially her husband, biochemist Dr. Benjamin Schachter, who isolated the widely used hormone replacement drug Premarin.

Benjamin Schachter was not only a moral support; he looked after the home while she completed her training in dermatology in New York. Later, when he was offered a one-year position as professor of biochemistry at the University of Sakatchewan, she maintained "the stability on the home front."

Drs. Ricky Kanee and Benjamin Schachter in front of the portrait in the waiting room of the Ricky Kanee Schachter Dermatology Centre at Women's College Hospital.

The couple, who will have been married for 53 years in July, have two children, Daniel, a dermatologist in practice with his mother, and Bonnie, an occupational therapist at the Hugh MacMillan Rehabilitation Centre.

Schachter has seen many changes in dermatology, especially the introduction of antibiotics and steroids. Vitamin D derivatives and ultraviolet rays are now used in the treatment of psoriasis, and leg ulcers receive better treatment.

Schachter is especially proud of the Ricky Kanee Schachter Dermatology Centre at Women's College Hospital. The centre treats many AIDS patients for skin diseases like Kaposi's sarcoma.

A quick tour of the centre shows well-fitted examination, treatment and surgery rooms, cheerful waiting rooms, light airy colors and even domed ceilings.

Rushing off to see more patients, she obviously gets a kick out of pointing out pictures of "those who said no" — those who lacked the insight to realize her potential from the outset.

Dear friend,

I have known David Jacobs for many years. I am especially proud that he is our candidate in St. Andrew–St. Patrick because David has been a forceful voice in the Jewish community, both as a media commentator on the CBC, and in his work for the B'nai Brith League for Human Rights.

David Jacobs' life and his work as a lawyer is a daily expression of "tikkun olam." And I know that he will carry that commitment forward proudly and effectively as your elected representative. I cannot think of a better MPP to serve the needs of Jewish seniors and our community as a whole.

At this time of year, both David and I extend our best wishes that you have enjoyed a joyful Pesach holiday with family and friends.

Chag Sameach! Good Yom Tov!

EARTH WEEK 1995

Trees are important - to the air we breathe and the water we drink, to the soil, enhancing the beauty of our landscapes and ensuring the quality of our lives. During EARTH WEEK, we have the opportunity to re-dedicate ourselves to protecting the environment of this planet we all share by purchasing and planting trees. This year, EARTH WEEK concludes on Shabbat April 22, the last day of Pesach.

JNF will mark EARTH WEEK in a very special way. Our University Student Division will plant a tree right here in Toronto to match each tree purchased for planting in Israel. They are organizing a special tree-planting in Metro on May 7, in co-operation with The Evergreen Foundation.

Frid's elegant touch

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — In what he considers a world of turmoil, sculptor Misha Frid creates his own world of sanity and grace.

Committed to portraying the beautiful and dispelling the pain, Frid focuses on love, elegance, pleasure — a healing release from today's tensions.

Visitors to his exhibition, Sculptor of Dreams, presented by the Sculptor's Society of Canada at its gallery in First Canadian Place until May 5, are enfolded by a scene of emerging spring.

Frid's Dream Series, Music Series, Internal Harmony, as well as individual pieces, are uplifting. His sculptures, banked with flowers in contrast with the surrounding urban towers, seem to breathe renewal.

Enduring bronze and shimmering crystal acrylic are his mediums.

The Music Series (bronze) explores the power of music as it affects the relationship between man and woman, linked through an instrument. There is a sense of harmony, as the lovers create and respond to music together, each dependent on the other to realize fulfilment. The Magic Flute, pictured here, suggests the plaintive notes of the instrument wafting on air as the entranced woman rests intimately against the man. He needs her response to confirm their mutual love.

Internal Harmony (bronze) interprets the sympathetic relationship between man, woman and nature. The characters reveal tenderness and strength as they pursue the cycle of life.

In Nature, man is symbolically portrayed as a tree. Woman lies in the grass at his roots, gently nurturing him.

In the allegorical Dream Series (bronze and stone) animals and birds interact with humans. The animals and birds, from powerful lion to stately swan, represent the different personalities of the man. The female figure is given human form.

Passion Reined displays a woman riding a fleet-footed horse. Is she controlling him, or is he carrying her away?

Frid's crystal acrylics glisten. In Adam and Eve, man and woman seal their earthly love with a kiss and rise entwined in a devotion without beginning or end. The cameo profiles at the base are surmounted by the floating figures, at once sensual and ethereal.

Swan Lake (crystal) captures the moment of transformation when the beautiful princess becomes a swan. Inspired by the genius of Tchaikovsky, this sculpture was designed as a tribute to the tradition of the great Russian ballet.

Caryatida is unique; it is actually a coffee table melding the esthetic and the functional. A supple figure, reminiscent of the classic caryatids that graced ancient temples, holds an oval of sheer glass like a diaphanous veil over the head.

Frid's most recent bronze, The Dreamer, is a small, exquisitely created young woman, head bent forward, knees drawn up, hair cascading. She is clearly at peace.

Frid has exhibited his sculpture across North America, Europe and the Orient.

He and his wife Galina recently returned from a trip to Israel and they are planning to introduce his work in Eilat and other Israeli cities.

Mimouna

Les origines de la fête de la Mimouna

In the following article, staff writer Elias Levy gives a brief history of the festival of Mimouna, speculating on the origin of the name of the holiday and explaining its religious and cultural significance.

ELIAS LEVY
Reporter du CJN

La septième nuit de Pessah (le huitième jour en Diaspora), la plupart des communautés juives clôturent la célébration de cette fête solennelle avec nostalgie. Ce n'est pas le cas des communautés sépharades originaires des contrées d'Afrique du Nord. En effet, ce soir-là, les Juifs maghrébins continuent à louer, dans la joie et l'allégresse, les riches vertus spirituelles de cette fête. Ils célèbrent la Mimouna. Une imposante fête qui se déroule dans une atmosphère de liesse et de camaraderie.

Que signifie Mimouna? Quelles sont les origines de cette fête traditionnelle vigoureusement ancrée dans les us et coutumes des communautés sépharades originaires des pays d'Afrique du Nord? Les mystères entourant les vagues origines de la Mimouna n'ont jamais été élucidés.

En effet, le terme Mimouna a donné lieu à diverses étymologies, la plupart fantaisistes, ayant été retenues le plus souvent pour servir d'assises au rôle idéologique que l'on veut faire jouer à cette fête.

Une première version soutient que la fête de la Mimouna commémore le décès du père du très célèbre Maïmonide -Moïse Ibn Maymun-. L'Hiloula -pèlerinage auprès de la sépulture d'un Tsaddik (très grand sage)- dédiée à la mémoire du père bien aimé de cette grande figure de proue du judaïsme sépharade aurait donné lieu à la célébration de la Mimouna.

Mais, comme l'explique l'un des meilleurs spécialistes de l'Histoire des Juifs du Maghreb, le professeur Haïm Zafrani, dans son remarquable ouvrage "Mille ans de vie juive au Maroc" (Editions Maisonneuve et Larose, 1983), la référence à Maïmonide est fantaisiste.

"Maïmonide, qui semble avoir séjourné au Maroc, après sa fuite de Cordoue, à l'époque des persécutions almohades (milieu du XIIe siècle), a laissé des traces profondes dans la mémoire des Juifs maghrébins. Cet épisode a donné naissance à de fabuleux récits et légendes colportés dans tout le monde juif", soutient cet éminent historien (pp. 242-247).

Mais, l'explication la plus plausible aux yeux des Sépharades a une connotation mystique. Mimouna ne serait que la déformation, avec l'accent arabe, du mot hébreu Emouna qui signifie "foi". D'éminents commentateurs du Talmud ont affirmé que si la Pâque commémore la délivrance historique du peuple juif du joug oppressant égyptien, elle célèbre aussi la "foi et la croyance" en la délivrance future, en la fin de l'exil et au retour messianique du peuple juif sur sa terre ancestrale.

Dans les récits bibliques consacrés à la sortie du peuple juif d'Egypte, on nous rappelle que: "C'est au mois de Nissan qu'Israël a été délivré de l'esclavage d'Egypte et c'est en Nissan qu'il sera de nouveau délivré". Ainsi, il est impératif que les Juifs ne perdent pas leur foi, leur Emouna-Mimouna. Ils doivent prouver à tout moment que celle-ci demeure vivace et intacte et que "même si le Messie tarde, nous l'attendrons toujours impatiemment".

L'aspect religieux de la Mimouna est omniprésent dans la liturgie spéciale qui est récitée au cours de la soirée qui clôture la fête de Pessah. Ainsi, des textes bibliques (Proverbes), mishnaïques (Traité des Pères), des poèmes didactiques anticipant sur le rituel de Shabu'ot (azharot) ont été incorprés dans la trame des prières rituelles psalmodiées ce soir-là.

Mais, au fil du temps, l'imaginaire social judéo-maghrébin et la dimension folklorique conférée à la Mimouna ont redonné un sens populaire au thème central de cette fête. Mimouna veut dire aussi en arabe "bonne fortune". La référence à la patronne de cette nuit "bénie" (Mabruka), elle-même surnommée Lalla Mimuna (Dame Fortune), est exprimée avec éloquence dans les voeux de "Terb'hou Outsaad'ou!" réussissez dans vos entreprises et réjouissez-vous) formulés au cours des nombreuses visites et tournées effectuées tout au long de cette soirée.

Le soir de la Mimouna, tous les coeurs et les portes sont ouverts. Nul besoin d'être invité. Votre carte d'invitation, c'est le salut traditionnel: "Terb'hou Outsaad'ou!" ...

Celebration of Mimouna a major Israeli event

By ELIAS LEVY
CJN Staff Reporter

Since the early '80s, the celebration of Mimouna in Israel has become a major national holiday.

Every year, hundreds of thousands of Israelis of all origins have participated in the festivities organized throughout the country to celebrate the end of Pesach.

In the brochure Mimouna, published by the Israeli movement Beyachad, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres describes this religious cultural event as "an offering from the North African community to Israeli society, an offering accepted joyously.

"Its rich folklore and its message of friendship, solidarity and love of neighbor have been adopted by all Israelis. The people of Israel together celebrate this magnificent festival which contributes to unity and rapprochement."

Traditional eastern dance presentations, concerts of Andalusian music, liturgical hymns and piyutim, parades, art exhibitions, picnics, religious events and pilgrimages to the holy burial sites of prominent Sephardi rabbis go on all through the day.

Beyachad, a cultural organization founded in the '70s by Jewish intellectuals from North Africa, actively campaigned for several years to have the government declare Mimouna a national holiday.

The primary objectives of Beyachad are to strengthen the unity of the Jewish people, spread the rich cultural heritage of North African Judaism and encourage all Jewish communities in Israel and the Diaspora to celebrate Mimouna.

Although this was traditionally a holiday for those from the Maghreb, Mimouna is now a cultural custom of other Sephardi communities in Israel from Iraq, Yemen, Turkey and Lebanon.

Of the large percentage of Israelis of Sephardi origin, those from Morocco in particular have retained their traditional music, folklore and rituals, in their celebration of Mimouna and Hilloula, the Lag b'Omer pilgrimage to the burial sites of those they venerate.

That is the memory recreated and contributed by the Jewish communities from North Africa. The celebration of Mimouna in Israel is proof of the vitality of their rich spiritual and cultural heritage.

Le soir de la "Mimouna", la danse, la joie et la bonne humeur sont au rendez-vous.

Mimouna

Morocco pilgrimage a return to roots

Miracles and observance, triumph and tragedy

By BRIGITTE DAYAN

As I entered the Moroccan cemetery, a phrase from the Rosh Hashanah davening popped into my head.

"Adam yesodo meafar vesofo leafer." A person's origin is from dust and his destiny is back to dust.

How true, I thought, as I walked into the cemetery that holds the last 500-plus years of my history.

I had come on a family pilgrimage of sorts to find my great-grandfather's grave, a notion not at all foreign to Sephardi Jewry, known for its veneration of holy people. It's a reverence expressed by visits, often en masse, to the graves of the holy ones of past generations.

In this case, I had travelled from my native Chicago to Marrakech, a city that has shaped my upbringing, my values and most certainly my passions, but to which I had never been.

I am the first generation in more than 500 years born outside Morocco. On both my mother's and my father's side, I can trace my ancestry back to 1492, when the Jews of Spain were forced to leave, many of them fleeing to nearby Morocco.

Brigitte Dayan at the grave of her great-grandfather.

I am also the first in my family to return to Morocco. I use the word "return" because, like the chozer b'teshuvah (the newly-religious one who returns to Judaism) I, too, was returning to my roots.

Throughout my life, my Jewish appetite has been fed stories of old, stories of my great-grandfathers and their lives.

I visited an elderly Jewish jeweller in the mellah, the old Jewish quarter of Marrakech. He told me his most vivid memory of my paternal great-grandfather is one of him in synagogue with the Zohar open on his lap.

It is said that when my paternal great-grandfather, Rabbi Shlomo Dayan, or Baba Shlomo, as the family affectionately refers to him, was on his deathbed, he held a lively discussion with Rav Shimon Yochai and Rav Meir Baal HaNes (a second century scholar and miracle worker), something he was wont to do. He asked them to plead with G-d on his behalf; he did not want to die yet. He was 66 and wanted to finish his 70 years, ostensibly like King David, the father of his biblical namesake.

Suddenly, as if a bat kol (heavenly voice) came from on high, he called my pregnant grandmother, his daughter-in-law, into the room and told her she would give birth to a son. She did, and he bears the name Shlomo.

But ultimately, he stopped fighting, for he knew he had to die. Marrakech was beset by a severe drought that year, and he had prayed to G-d for rain. The day the rain fell, allowing all living things to be sustained, my great-grandfather began his journey towards death. He died and was buried on erev Rosh Hashanah.

At an age when most little children were listening to nursery rhymes at bedtime, my sisters and I were listening to real stories of miracles and observance, triumph and tragedy.

As I grew older, I would press my relatives for information on all aspects of our family's history, gathering information and tape-recording some of the stories. But the historian in me would not be satisfied until she saw for herself the locale that spurred the stories, and in the process, became their custodian.

As I visited Marrakech, nothing stirred me more than the cemetery that housed my great-grandfather. Not the rundown and now decrepit mellah where he grew up; not the synagogues where he prayed on Shabbat and holidays; not even the kollel to which the city's sole remaining rabbi summoned me so that I could look in the community records at the ketubot and other legal documents my great-grandfather signed in the 1930s.

I entered the cemetery and immediately looked for the shomer, the faithful guard who knows the precise location of all graves. I asked him in French if he could guide me to my great-grandfather's grave. He waved his arms and began to speak in Arabic. Like most of the elderly Jews in Morocco, born before the country became a French protectorate in 1912, he spoke no French.

In my broken Arabic, I asked him: "Where is Rabbi Shlomo Dayan? I am his great-granddaughter."

He got up and immediately led me to the grave, at the extreme northeast corner of the cemetery.

I had asked a fellow American to videotape my visit with his camcorder. He began to film me, as I explained where the grave was, how to get there from the entrance of the cemetery, who Rabbi Shlomo was, when he lived, and why I was here.

In accordance with tradition, I then lit two candles given to me by my mother to show my presence at the grave.

I asked him to turn off the camera. I took out my book of Psalms, because tehillim are one of those great things to say when you don't know what else to say — or do.

And a stream of tears began to flow.

I closed my book of tehillim, put my head down on his grave and remembered my grandmother's advice prior to my departure:

"Brigitte, ma cherie," she had told me, "ask your mother to write you your personal prayer in Arabic, because Baba Shlomo, he didn't speak French."

We had all laughed affectionately at her simple ways. But standing there, hunched over my great-grandfather's grave, my grandmother's words didn't seem so simple.

I asked my great-grandfather to forgive me for addressing him in French, but I knew he would understand me nonetheless.

Having been appointed the emissary for every member of the family, I first voiced the prayers on their behalf.

And then, I broke out into my own, personal prayer, one whose content I had developed throughout my life, but whose words I composed on the spot.

I left the Jewish cemetery of Marrakech more alive than I entered it. I am certain my great-grandfather knew it. I sensed his proud smile as I stood over his grave and told him I was striving to follow his example, so that, G-d willing, one day, my great-grandchildren will be another link in the chain of Jewish transmission.

Brigitte Dayan lives in Chicago and is a frequent visitor to Montreal, where much of her family resides.

Mimouna evenings a joyous memory

By RENEE LEVY
Special to The CJN

Did I really live the experience, or was it a distant dream?

Today those Mimouna evenings in Casablanca seem to be part of another lifetime, filled with symbolism.

As far back as I can remember, I can recall those magical evenings in the house where I grew up, flooded with light. All the lamps shone on a table set for the occasion with plates full of the most delicious cakes, enough for all tastes, because so many people came to visit us that night.

I can still smell the perfume of the mimosa, the bougainvillaea and the multitude of other flowers whose scent filled the house.

Renée Levy

Besides the sweets and the flowers, there was another important custom: a large fresh fish in a silver platter on a bed of flour at the centre of the table. The fish was said to represent prosperity, the flour purity. In the flour were fresh beans, as a symbol of hope.

In a crystal glass filled with oil, we used to put a small gold object, like a coin or a wedding ring.

There was also honey and lettuce leaves which the hostess offered her guests. She or one of the grandmothers dipped a lettuce leaf in the honey and put it into the mouth of the person she wanted to bless. The gesture was accompanied by these words, in French or Spanish: "May your life be sweet and may you live in joy to the age of 100."

We also prepared a sort of pancake, called moufleta, after the stars came out, since we could not eat any chametz until nightfall. We ate the moufleta with butter and honey.

In the old days when people could eat hardly any sweets for the week of Pesach, they especially enjoyed the moufleta with fresh mint tea.

Lots of friends and relatives came; we laughed, sang, talked long and loud, and we ate. There was a constant to-and-fro, a holiday atmosphere enjoyed by young and old.

One unusual aspect, however: the visitors were almost all men, sometimes accompanied by their children but rarely by their wives, who were at home to receive their own friends and relatives.

The visits were mostly quite brief, but friendly, and marked by affection and sincerity. It was a special evening when the children were allowed to stay up and the festivities lasted well into the night, since we had a large family and many friends.

Affection, sincerity

Everyone was received equally; people could come without being invited because "our friends' friends are our friends." That describes the evening exactly.

When the father came home from his rounds after all the excitement, the family wished each other good night, but not without the tradition of saying to one another in Judeo-Arabic, "May you win out." In other words, may you be prosperous this year and succeed in all you undertake.

Happy are those who, today, can still live those fantastic moments.

Renee Levy was born in Casablanca and now lives in France.

Mme Renée Lévy se remémore des Mimounas à Casablanca

RENEE LEVY
Collaboration spéciale pour le CJN

Ai-je vraiment vécu ce que je vais vous raconter, ou est-ce un rêve lointain?

Ces soirées de Mimouna à Casablanca me paraissent aujourd'hui sorties de l'irréel. La soirée de Mimouna clôture la fête de Pessah.

Cette soirée pleine de significations paraît quelque peu mystérieuse et magique.

D'aussi loin que remontent mes souvenirs, je revis ce soir magique dans la maison de mon enfance inondée de lumière. Toutes les lampes jettent leurs feux sur une table dressée pour la circonstance où s'étalent une multitude de plateaux de gâteaux plus délicieux les uns que les autres. Il y en a pour tous les goûts car très nombreuses sont les personnes qui viennent nous rendre visite ce soir-là.

Je sens encore le parfum des mimosas, des bougainvilliers et de bien des autres fleurs qui embaumaient toute la maison.

Outre les friandises et les fleurs qui couvrent la table, il y a une coutume à laquelle on tient beaucoup. Un grand poisson très frais dans un plat en argent sur un lit de farine trône au milieu de la table. Selon certains, le poisson représente la prospérité et la farine la pureté. La farine est elle-même piquée ça et là de fèves fraîches, signe d'espérance.

Dans un verre en cristal plein d'huile, on a l'habitude de mettre un petit objet en or, une pièce de monnaie, une main ou même une alliance.

Il y a également du miel et plusieurs coeurs de salade que la maîtresse de maison offre à ses invités. C'est elle ou une aïeule qui trempe une feuille de salade dans le miel et la met dans la bouche de la personne qu'elle veut bénir. Ce geste est accompagné par ces mots, parfois en français parfois en espagnol: "Que ta vie soit douce et que tu vives la joie jusqu'à cent ans".

On prépare aussi une sorte de crêpe, la moufleta, après la sortie des étoiles, puisqu'on ne peut manger de hametz qu'à la nuit tombée. La moufleta est dégustée avec du beurre et du miel.

Dans le temps où Pessah était une semaine où l'on ne pouvait manger pratiquement aucune friandise, la moufleta était particulièrement appréciée accompagnée de thé à la menthe fraîche.

Les parents et les amis affluent; on rit, on chante, on parle beaucoup et fort, et on mange. C'est un va-et-vient incessant, une ambiance de fête qui fait la joie des petits et des grands.

Une particularité cependant, qu'on ne retrouve je crois que ce soir-là. Les visiteurs sont presque exclusivement des messieurs, accompagnés quelquefois de leurs enfants, mais très rarement de leurs épouses, celles-ci devant rester chez elles pour recevoir, à leur tour, parents et amis.

Ces visites sont la plupart du temps assez brèves mais amicales et certainement empreintes d'affection et de sincérité. C'est une soirée privilégiée où les enfants ont le droit de veiller et où les festivités durent jusqu'à une heure avancée de la nuit, la famille étant grande et les amis nombreux.

Les gens sont reçus avec la même gentillesse; les connaissances peuvent venir sans invitation car "les amis de nos amis sont nos amis". Cette formule caractérise tout-à-fait cette soirée.

Lorsque le père de famille rentre de sa tournée et après cette agitation nocturne, on se retrouve.

On se souhaite bonne nuit, sans oublier selon la tradition, de se dire, en judéo-arabe, "que tu gagnes". Autrement dit, que cette année te soit prospère et que tu réussisses dans tout ce que tu entreprends.

Heureux ceux qui, de nos jours, peuvent encore vivre ces instants fantastiques.

Mme Renée Levy est née à Casablanca. Elle habite maintenant Paris.

Les Mimounas de Benhantoz le Tangérois

ELIE BENCHETRIT
Collaboration spéciale pour le CJN

Une brise légère soufflait sur la ville en cette soirée d'avril, les synagogues se vidaient et les fidèles d'un pas alerte s'empressaient de regagner leurs foyers.

Ce samedi soir, "noché de Alhad", comme on disait à Tanger et dans la zone nord, revêtait une importance particulière, c'était aussi la "Mimona", fête qui marquait la fin de Pessah et que tous célébraient avec faste. Les boulangeries restaient ouvertes en soirée pour que les Juifs puissent acheter le pain, toute une série d'autres vendeurs ambulants offraient des épis de blé ou des fruits qui serviraient à décorer les tables.

Rahamim Benhantoz, mendiant et en même temps personnage folklorique tout à fait Tangérois, s'empressa dès la fin de la havdala de quitter la Esnoga de Souiri (1) avec un grand bouquet de "arrahan" (2). Il se dirigea vers le Boulevard, nom qui désignait la ville européenne. Sur son chemin, il arrêta d'autres Juifs pour leur offrir une petite branche d'"arrahan" en leur disant: "Chavouah Tov, Moad Tov, Besiman Tov, Zakhor le Tov". Tous lui donnèrent quelques pièces, et Rahamim les bénit avec ferveur. Une fois qu'il finit d'écouler sa marchandise, il se dirigea vers un immeuble d'aspect cossu, il savait que quelques familles juives aisées y habitaient. Il monta au premier étage et remarqua une porte d'appartement qui était ouverte selon la coutume de "Mimona", il y franchit le seuil en criant "Ya Mimon, Ya Shalom, Ya Baba Tarbah!", ce qui revenait à dire: de l'argent, de la paix et que vous soyiez comblés de biens.

La maîtresse de maison le fit passer dans le salon où la table traditionnelle était dressée. Le lait, le miel, un plat de farine avec des fèves vertes, des épis de blé vert, une motte de beurre frais enveloppée dans des feuilles de figuier, un grand poisson cru trônant sur une assiette, une variété de gâteaux au miel, des tartes venant de la très renommée pâtisserie française "Porte" ainsi que d'autres gâteaux dans la pure tradition hispanique, meringues, "tocino del cielo" et "brazo de gitano" qui provenaient de la Confiteria Espanola.

Une délicieuse odeur de "terit" s'échappait de la cuisine où deux bonnes s'affairaient à la préparation de ces délicieuses crêpes ou mofletas qui étaient la "ada" (3) de la plupart des familles et que l'on s'apprêtait à déguster enduites de beurre et de miel.

"Sois le bienvenu Rahamim, je vais te préparer une assiette". La maîtresse de maison connaissait Rahamim depuis fort longtemps et surtout son appétit proverbial. En l'espace de quelques minutes, Rahamim goba une demi-douzaine de mofletas accompagnées de deux verres de thé à la menthe et de quelques gâteaux. "Un petit verre de "aguardiente" (4) ou "mahia" me ferait le plus grand bien pour m'aider à digérer", s'empressa-t-il de demander. Après l'avoir vidé d'un trait, il se leva et adressa ses bénédictions habituelles: "Que el Dio vos dé riqueza y ganancia en zéjut de esta noche de Eliaou Hanavi, amen, amen, amen!"

Après les remerciements de l'hôtesse et sur le pas de la porte, il sortit de sa poche un sac en plastic et le tendit à celle-ci: "No se olvidé del "awin" (5) para la mujer y los niños", autrement dit, n'oubliez pas de me donner quelques douceurs pour ma femme et mes enfants. Quand le sac fut plein il s'en alla de son pas leste vers des étages supérieurs. La soirée venait de commencer et elle s'annonçait prometteuse. "Ya Mimon, Ya Shalom, Ya Baba Tarbah!"

Mais où sont les "Mimonas" d'antan? se demanda Rahamim trente ans après et devenu richissime homme d'affaires grâce à la fabrication industrielle et à l'exportation de mofletas à l'échelle mondiale. Calé dans un fauteuil dans sa résidence d'hiver à Miami, il se languissait du bon vieux temps...

Mets et coutumes de la Mimouna

The traditional foods are what many of us associate with a holiday. Staff writer Elias Levy here describes the foods served for Mimouna, outlining the significance of the mainly sweet dishes offered to guests.

ELIAS LEVY
Reporter du CJN

Les succulents mets orientaux servis le soir de la Mimouna se distinguent particulièrement par leurs goûts exquis, leur esthétique originale et leur symbolisme.

Les principaux plats ornant les magnifiques tables dressées ce soir-là sont:

1-Un grand poisson non cuit, déposé sur une assiette ovale ornée de feuilles de laitue. Depuis la plus haute antiquité, ce plat est le symbole juif par excellence de la fertilité. Des adages juifs racontent qu'une bonne et prospère année n'a un véritable sens que si elle est partagée avec ferveur avec de nombreux enfants.

2-Une assiette de farine décorée de sept gousses de fèves vertes. Le chiffre 7 est le symbole traditionnel de la fertilité chez les Berbères du Maroc.

3-Une autre assiette de farine, ornée de bijoux et de pièces d'argent. Un petit verre d'huile est aussi placé sur ce plat. Au Maroc, la couleur blanche symbolise la joie et l'allégresse. Quant aux bijoux et au verre d'huile, ils incarnent la richesse et l'abondance. Plusieurs communautés juives marocaines avaient même comme coutume d'ajouter du levain dans ce plat afin de marquer le passage de Matsa à Hametz.

5-Un plateau rempli de fruits secs: amandes, dates, noix et fruits frais de saison pour que l'année qui vient soit douce.

Les mets traditionnels servis ce soir-là sont:

-Zaban, du nougat blanc truffé d'amandes.

Des plats succulents

-Mrozia, des raisins secs cuits dans de l'huile et du sucre, mélangés avec des amandes.

-Maazoun, confiture de pelures d'orange, coings, carottes, aubergines...

-Tmr-Maamrim, dattes fourrées de pâte d'amande colorée.

-Gâteaux divers conçus à base de noix de coco, cacahuètes, amandes. Des cigares enrobés de sucre...

-Moufleta, une sorte de crêpe trempée dans du miel, du beurre ou du sucre.

Certaines familles juives marocaines ont aussi comme "ada" (coutume) de se régaler avec un succulent couscous au lait, à la cannelle et au sucre.

En ce qui a trait aux boissons et liqueurs consommées ce soir-là, on évite exceptionnellement de boire du café, en raison de sa couleur noire qui ne porte pas bonheur. Par ailleurs, on ne consomme que des aliments sucrés, signe de bonne augure pour l'année qui commence. On ne mange pas non plus de pain, pour ne pas passer brusquement de Matsa au Hametz, ni de viande. Compagnon de tous les instants de détente et de joie, le thé à la menthe marocain est servi à profusion au cours de la soirée.

Traditionnellement, la maîtresse de maison accueillait ses hôtes assise sur un tapis, occupée à préparer des exquises crêpes Moufleta et à servir du thé à la menthe à ses convives.

Ce soir-là, les portes, les fenêtres, les miroirs, et la table sont décorés de fleurs annonçant le retour du printemps et d'épis de blé symbolisant le retour à la consommation du pain.

Fertilité, abondance, verdure, joie et bonne humeur, telles sont les principaux symboles de cette magnifique fête juive.

La plupart des informations relatives aux mets servis le soir de la Mimouna consignées dans cet article proviennent d'une brochure informative qui a été publiée par le Mouvement israélien Beyahad.

Israel Bonds to honor six Ottawa women

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — Israel Bonds will honor six outstanding women for their remarkable volunteer commitment at an awards dinner.

"We wanted to celebrate the type of people who would never get a chance to be celebrated, people who have been working quietly in the community for many years," said Israel Bonds Women's Division chair Vera Klein.

The honorees have volunteer careers spanning 10 to 40 years.

Carol Kassie joined the board of Ottawa's Jewish Community Centre 14 years ago and is currently JCC president. She has chaired Arts Alive, Ottawa's annual Jewish literary festival, and was one of the founding members of the Ottawa cable television program Shalom Ottawa. She has been an active member of the National Council of Jewish Women, a board member of the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa and an events chair of the United Jewish Appeal. She visits elderly residents at Hillel Lodge, Ottawa's Jewish home for the aged, every two weeks.

Vera Gara, a survivor who spent the last two years of World War II in Nazi concentration camps, has been a tireless supporter of Holocaust education. For many years, she chaired the Holocaust Remembrance Committee and organized Yom Hashoah ceremonies. She spearheaded the naming of Raoul Wallenberg Park and the installation of a commemorative statue in Nepean, a suburb of Ottawa, to honor the Swedish hero.

Gara also initiated several educational exhibits, including the Anne Frank exhibit which was visited by 24,000 people when it was on display at the National War Museum three years ago. For the past 20 years, she has been a volunteer at the Ottawa Civic Hospital.

Goldie Cantor has been an active member of some of Ottawa's key Jewish institutions. She has held various executive positions on the Machzikei Hadas and Beth Shalom congregations' sisterhoods. For many years, she chaired Golden Aged Luncheons for seniors and visited shut-ins as a Meals-on-Wheels volunteer. Cantor is the past president of the Hillel Academy PTA and a life member of Hadassah. A former board member of Hillel Lodge, she has also served as the membership chair of its women's auxiliary.

Celebrating people working quietly in the community

With three children between the ages of 3 and 10, Lori Loeb still manages to dedicate considerable volunteer time to the Jewish community and the Children's Hospital of Eastern Ontario. She has chaired the hospital's annual Teddy Bear Picnic Celebrity Breakfast, famous for its onsite medical clinic for damaged teddies, and is an executive member of the Friends of Ronald MacDonald House. A graduate of the Young Women's Leadership Council which prepares women for leadership roles in the Jewish community, Loeb is now a board member of the Jewish Community Council and has chaired several UJA events.

Shelly Schachnow and her husband recently started visiting seniors' homes as members of the Adopt-a-Friend program. It's one commitment in a volunteer career that saw Schachnow serve as her synagogue's sisterhood president, president of the synagogue's charity bingo and volunteer cook and bingo organizer for the Golden Age Club. She also volunteers at citizenship court and types the newspaper for a rehabilitation centre.

Barbara Solomon-Brown, a social worker in geriatric services and mother of two young children aged 2 and 4, is an active member of the Young Israel Congregation future planning and shalom committees. She is a graduate of the Young Women's Leadership Council and a board member of Hillel Lodge.

The gala dinner in honor of these women will be held April 25 at Congregation Machzikei Hadas.

Desert research has wide-reaching implications

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It seems unlikely, but the Desert Sweet tomato, a pricey — and delectable — Israeli import, is grown in soil irrigated with heavily salted water. In fact, the five per cent saline content is almost 1½ times that of sea water.

The Desert Sweet tomato is but one of Dov Pasternak's agricultural research projects with implications for Middle East peace, world hunger and environmental issues.

The Brazilian-born director of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev's Institute of Agriculture and Applied Biology — a tall, stocky man with a shock of gray hair — is working with researchers in China, Cameroon, Australia, India and Chile to boost crop production in arid lands.

The International Program for Arid Land Crops (IPALAC), of which Pasternak is scientific coordinator, was launched in 1993 under the auspices of UNESCO. It was based on the success of Pasternak and his colleagues in importing desert plants to Israel and, through selection and hybridization, transforming them into cultivated crops.

Pasternak fell in love with the desert while an Israeli high school student on a class trip to the Negev. He came to Israel at age nine, about a year after it became a state. He has lived there ever since, with the exception of a six-year stint working on his master's and PhD degrees in Australia, a country which is two-thirds desert, he pointed out during a recent interview in Toronto.

His Canadian itinerary also included visits with Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev in Montreal, Ottawa, Winnipeg and Vancouver.

An early project of Pasternak's in Israel involved the domestication of the Arizona jojoba plant, best known for its use in cosmetics. "We were able to increase the yield from 200 grams of fruit per plant to 3 kilograms, by selection and hybridization," he said.

The lengthy research eventually led to the creation of a company producing jojoba for commercial use.

Another research project resulted in the development of a cactus that blooms and produces fruit year-round instead of once annually.

Dov Pasternak

"One day we decided that whatever we're doing for Israel should be done for the arid lands of the world," Pasternak said.

Food shortages in developing countries with semi-arid land constitute "one of the biggest problems of the 20th century," said Pasternak. "They don't have the right kind of crops suitable for arid conditions."

Since 1982, Pasternak has been involved in three co-operative projects with Egypt — studying the use of saline water, increasing the productivity of small animals through non-synthetic methods, and improving greenhouse crop production.

Pasternak disagrees with "backroom economists and philosophers who are predicting doomsday for water in the Middle East."

Much can be done to optimize the use of available water, he believes. Possible solutions include using available saline water and cultivating plants which thrive on a minimum amount of water.

And, as if his agenda weren't full enough, Pasternak is hoping to begin work soon on a U.S. government-funded project with Hopi Indians in Arizona to encourage the younger generation to remain on the land

Photography exhibit popular

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — A photo exhibit of Danish resistance during the Nazi regime is drawing large crowds of adults and schoolchildren to the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre.

The display, which opened March 26 with representatives from the Jewish, Danish and Swedish communities present, runs to May 8.

The Resistance and Rescue exhibit was put together by Thanks to Scandinavia Inc., an organization chaired by entertainer Victor Borge, a Danish Jew. It commemorates the 50th anniversary of the rescue of 7,200 Danish Jews by a flotilla of Sweden-bound boats put together by their countrymen in 1943.

The exhibit has toured around the world and across Canada. The Vancouver opening was hosted by Robert Krell of the Holocaust centre and Faye Khazan, president of the Jewish Festival of the Arts Society, which is co-sponsoring the show.

The photos, by Judy Ellis Glickman, include portraits, landscapes and historic sites. Glickman was recently admitted to the Royal Photographic Society of Great Britain.

Visitors to the Vancouver show are taken on tours and meet with a survivor and/or rescuer.

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer Fred M. Catzman has been researching their origins over the past few years. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

TOON

Ralph Stein's forebears were surnamed Toon, whom I remember as neighbors.

He thought that the name was related to the Hebrew for fast (like Yom Kippur).

I reject that theory because his ancestors came from Lithuania and they would not pronounce the Hebrew word tanis (fast) as Tunis.

Ezrath Nashim hospital celebrates 100th birthday

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Ezrath Nashim Herzog Memorial Hospital was founded in Jerusalem 100 years ago.

It opened two years before Theodor Herzl convened the first Zionist Congress in 1897. It is now the foremost geriatric and psychiatric hospital in the country.

To celebrate 100 years of service, the Canadian Friends of Ezrath Nashim recently presented a gala centennial celebration concert at the Inn on the Park featuring internationally acclaimed artists including cellist Ofra Harnoy, lyric tenor Mark DuBois, Beth Tzedec Synagogue Cantor Paul Kowarsky, classic jazz violinist Lenny Solomon and the Gryphon Trio.

Renee Rubinstein, the president of the Toronto chapter of Canadian Friends of Ezrath Nashim announced that proceeds will support research in Alzheimer's disease and Parkinson's disease.

Ezrath Nashim is affiliated with the Hebrew University Hadassah Medical School and has developed cooperative projects with Montreal's McGill University and Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital and Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

Janice Segal, Toronto chapter coordinator told The CJN Ezrath Nashim will open a new Centre for Geriatric Ambulatory Services this summer, which will contain the Silver-Cooper Geriatric Rehabilitation Centre endowed by Canadians Lily and Nathan Silver and Florence and Sidney Cooper.

The hospital was founded in a two-room shelter in Jerusalem's Old City by a group of women who called themselves Women who Help. They had joined together at Chanukah to perform acts of charity and ultimately undertook the task of easing the conditions of mentally ill patients and providing them with proper food in addition to medical and nursing care.

The following year, they rented a new building outside the walled city and established what was then known as the Hospital for the Mentally and Chronically Ill.

In 1898, with the support of Baroness Adelaide de Rothschild and others, land was purchased in the western part of the New City. In 1902, with a donation from Isaiah Aaron Neustadt of Moscow, the first building, a women's wing was constructed. A men's wing was built eight years later and throughout the century, buildings and gardens have been added.

In 1919, Sarah Herzog became president of the hospital, serving for a quarter of a century. Her son, former Israeli president Chaim Herzog, has been named international chair of the centennial year.

"What the original group of women started a century ago, and the efforts of an ever-growing group of devoted volunteers who followed, have resulted in what is today a hospital in the vanguard of geriatric and psychiatric care ... rooted in the best Jewish values," said Rubinstein.

Israeli hockey team shows improvement

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A .500 record and a sixth place finish shouldn't get any team into the playoffs, but for Israel's national senior team, it marks a step forward for the organizationally challenged hockey squad.

Compiling a 3-3 record in its fourth International Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF) tournament, Israel "showed a lot of improvement," said defenceman Oded Orgil.

"We're one step ahead of the weaker teams and we're on a par or slightly better than the middle-range teams. We're half a step behind the better teams."

Orgil said the Israeli team was hampered by having to ice a small roster of only 16 skaters and three goalies. A major shakeup in the team's management just days before the tournament didn't help either.

The Canadian connection (from left) Miron Schacham, Oded Orgil and Mike Rubin, an oleh from Toronto, take a rest after a hard fought game in South Africa.

The bureuacratic boondoggle, which Orgil attributed to political infighting among the country's hockey czars, saw the resignation of Paul Shindman, the team's Toronto-born manager. It was Shindman who conceived and founded Israel's hockey program and gave it international exposure, but over the last few years his role was reduced to chief of the national team. Now even that is gone.

Prior to the tournament, the Israel hockey federation anounced that Gideon Lee, the team's Toronto-based coach, was being replaced. Shindman praised Lee, saying, "I can't think of a single person who has committed more time and effort to the team."

For the South Africa tournament, only four Canadian-based players made the trek to bolster the Israeli lineup. In addition to Orgil, junior-aged defenceman Ran Oz and forwards Evgeny Feldman and Miron Schacham made the trip.

Orgil said the team's newly installed coach, Simeon Yakubovitch, a former junior coach in the Soviet Union, is attempting to develop a style of hockey that blends characteristics of both Russian and Canadian hockey to create a unique Israeli style.

While employing the zigazagging style of Russian hockey, Yakubovitch continually urges the Israelis to take more shots and play a physical brand of hockey.

Placed in Group A of IIHF Pool C2 with Croatia, South Korea, South Africa and New Zealand, Israel opened against Croatia, the eventual tournament winner.

As is always the case, Israel started the tournament slowly and was down 2-0 after one period. The final was 7-2, a score that was indicative of the game, Orgil said.

In game 2, Israel faced off against New Zealand, a recent qualifier for IIHF competitions.

Israel recorded its first-ever shutout in international hockey, beating the kiwis 12-0. Yevgeni Gusin, who practised with teams in the East Coast and Colonial Hockey Leagues, and Boris Amromin shared the shutout. Oleg Agapov, a Russian-born player who plays professional bandy in Norway, had five goals, and his linemate Schacham registered six assists.

In game 3, Israel faced the South Koreans in what turned into a chippy contest. At one point, responding to the Koreans' unrelenting stickwork, 220-pound defenceman Ran Oz lost his cool and chased a Korean around the rink. Luckily for both, Oz didn't catch him and was spared ejection from the tournament.

The final was 7-1 for the bad guys.

South Africa was Israel's opponents in game 4 and the boys in blue and white handled them rather easily, winning 8-1.

With a 2-2 record, Israel was relegated to the consolation round. In game 5, they played Australia in a rink made foggy by high humidity. Unfortunately the Israelis played as if in a fog of their own making, losing 5-1. "We were just horrible," said Orgil.

Game 6 was against Belgium, a team that beat them 5-2 last year. "We were playing for pride," said Orgil. "We took it to them and played a strong, disciplined game."

Amromin was the star and Israel piled up the goals, winning 7-2.

Although they finished with the same 3-3 record as Australia, a one point goal differential gave the boys from the outback fifth place to Israel's sixth.

Sergei Gudzik, Feldman and Schacham were named Israel's MVPs.

Rabin rejects any role for IDF in Gaza

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The Israel Defence Force (IDF) will not return to the Gaza Strip because Israel cannot find Islamic terrorists there and has no interest in returning to Palestinian trouble spots, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin said in a Passover interview with The Jerusalem Post.

Rabin called on PLO leader Yasser Arafat not just to convict terrorists but to arrest all who assist or incite terror, even if they are Islamic religious leaders.

Rabin said he would accept a Palestinian state in Gaza if he thought that would stave off Palestinian demands in the rest of the territories.

"If it were possible, I don't see any problem in it," Rabin said. "I don't believe that any Palestinian will accept it ... They say to us: 'You signed the Oslo Declaration of Principles, so implement it.' "

Rabin suggested the terms he has set for Arafat on dealing with terror would help meet the July 1 deadline, when complete negotiations on the interim agreement are scheduled to conclude.

Asked to comment on Arafat's steps against Islamic militants following the April 9 Gaza suicide bombings, Rabin replied, "It is not enough he is doing it in the last week or the last few days, unless he does it with determination, strength, and as part of a continuous [effort].

"What we ask him is, one, to make sure that there is only one armed law enforcement body; two, ensure others will not carry arms, except with permission; three, search in an effective way for those who instigate organize, protect, or carry out the terror, and take them out of the area either by courts or administrative detention."

Since a suicide bus bombing in Tel Aviv last October, Israel has detained 2,700 Palestinians in the West Bank for interrogation or administrative detention.

Rabin said he hopes Arafat would take additional measures against militants, such as "prevent[ing] the appearances of arms at demonstrations" and that the Palestinian Police "be deployed along the fence of the Gaza Strip to prevent those who are trying to [threaten] our patrol near the fence. This is what he has to do."

Earlier last week, Rabin told the Labor Party caucus that the mixing of Palestinians and Israelis creates "a Garden of Eden for terrorists.

The theme of his 30-minute address was the difficulty of fighting suicide attacks.

He said terror existed before the Oslo agreement was signed. "Any attempt to link the suicide terror wave to Oslo is a lie."

He maintained that groups associated with Arafat stopped their terror attacks in the beginning of 1994, as Arafat had promised.

Rabin said the war on terror is made more difficult by terrorists' increasing level of sophistication, including high-quality forged Palestinian work permits.

Redeploying IDF troops in Gaza to crack down on Hamas and Islamic Jihad is complicated, a senior IDF officer said last Thursday.

"The army has contingency plans for such developments, but entering Gaza without adequate intelligence on the whereabouts of those we would be looking for, and obviously against the wishes of the Palestinian Authority, could place soldiers in an impossible situation. If you enter with a limited sized force, which is basically what we are talking about, soldiers would confront a house-to-house campaign. I doubt that would be effective," he said.

MKs favor IDF's return

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Six Labor members of the Knesset last week called on Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin to order the army to return to Gaza and clamp down on Muslim extremists.

The MKs called on the Israel Defence Force (IDF) "to hit" Hamas and Islamic Jihad cells in Gaza.

In an Israel Radio interview last week, Labor MK Eli Dayan said the security situation in Gaza is "intolerable." He said although the Palestinian Authority appears to have made an effort to combat terror, it had not done enough.

"We can't just rely on the Palestinian Authority any more. In our opinion, Islamic Jihad and Hamas extremists must be made to realize that there is a possibility the IDF will reach them wherever they are, and that there is no asylum for terrorists," Dayan said.

He said expressions like "victims of peace" heard after every terror attack are "worthless," and Labor needs to take real action if it is to be re-elected.

He denied the six MKs are helping the opposition Likud by opposing Rabin's policy.

"When talking about these things, it's not a matter of this or that party. It is the responsibility of the government to ensure the security of anyone who travels on the roads in the autonomous areas and also of the settlers who live there.

"We will continue to demand that the Palestinian Authority take control of the area, and we will help it if necessary. The PA should risk even the threat of a civil war with its so-called brethren, who want to destroy the peace process and harm the constructive Palestinians," Dayan stated.

Violent attacks against Jews rose in 1994

TEL AVIV — Violent attacks against Jews — those in which there was a clear intent to kill — rose last year to 72 worldwide, from 42 in 1993, according to a study released this month.

Incidents of anti-Semitism were up all over Europe, the United States, the former Soviet Union and the Middle East, said the Survey and Analysis of Anti-Semitism Worldwide — 1994, prepared by a project of Tel Aviv University.

The report found that Great Britain recorded, for the third consecutive year, the highest number of life-threatening incidents — 16 — followed by 15 in the United States and nine in France.

Rising neo-Nazism, nationalism and Muslim fundamentalism were cited as the main reasons for the increases.

Methods used included firearms, bombs, booby-trapped cars and assault weapons, the study said.

It found that violent attacks in Western Europe doubled last year from 15 to 31.

The report found that in Germany, the number of anti-Semitic incidents of all kinds increased by 100 per cent, and in the United States, there was a 10 per cent increase.

The recent B'nai Brith Canada annual audit found that anti-Semitic incidents in Canada last year rose by 12 per cent over the year before.

The survey was prepared in conjunction with the World Jewish Congress, the Anti-Defamation League and the Israeli government. It was presented recently to Prime Minister Yizhak Rabin.

The report was also tabled in the Knesset and presented to the U.S. Congress, the UN Human Rights Committee, the European Parliament and other major organizations.

Slain girl's organs donated by parents

CJN wire services and staff

JERUSALEM — The parents of Alisa Flatow, the 20-year-old American student killed in one of two April 9 bus bombings in the Gaza Strip, sought to give the gift of life last week while struggling with their grief.

Stephen and Rosalyn Flatow of West Orange, N.J., donated their daughter's organs after she died last Tuesday at Soroka Hospital in Beersheva.

Stephen Flatow said the donations would allow his daughter, a third-year student at Brandeis University, to make "a lasting contribution to the people of Israel."

Alisa's heart, liver, lungs, kidneys and pancreas were transplanted into six people in four hospitals around the country, and her corneas donated to an eye bank.

Two recipients have since died following the transplants — a 65-year-old lung recipient at Sheba Hospital in Tel Hashomer and a 42-year-old kidney and pancreas recipient at Ichilov Hospital in Tel Aviv — while the condition of the four other organ recipients was reported to be improving.

Stephen Flatow flew to his daughter's bedside after the April 9 suicide bombings which killed six Israeli soldiers and wounded dozens. He and his wife consulted with Rabbi Moshe Tendler, the world-renowned medical ethicist and biology professor at New York's Yeshiva University, before deciding to donate their daughter's organs.

Rabbi Tendler, an enthusiastic advocate of organ transplantation, encouraged them to go ahead.

Alisa's body was flown back for burial in New Jersey last Wednesday. More than 2,000 people attended the funeral.

Clinton expressed sympathies

U.S. President Bill Clinton last week expressed sympathies to the Flatow family, and several FBI agents were sent to Israel to help investigate the death. Since 1986 it has been a federal crime to kill an American abroad during terrorist attacks against a government or civilians.

White House spokesperson Mike McCurry said Clinton also stressed that "this death is a poignant reminder that the enemies of peace sometimes know no boundaries as they inflict their terrorist outrages on those who seek peace and seek to live in peace."

Meanwhile, 26 bombing victims were reported in stable condition in hospital.

The Week in Israel

April 10:

• Two suicide bombings near the communities of Kfar Darom and Netzarim in the Gaza took the lives of nine people and injured 54.

• The steering committee for the upcoming Middle East economic conference held its first meeting in Amman. The conference is a follow-up to the economic meeting last year in Casablanca. Israel was represented by Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin. Haaretz reported that in addition to attending the steering committee meeting, Beilin met with senior Jordanian officials.

• Israel's ambassador to Jordan, Shimon Shamir, officially presented his credentials to Jordan's Crown Prince Hassan in Amman.

April 11:

• Yediot Aharonot reported that manufacturers were expected to ask for a devaluation of the shekel against the U.S. dollar to encourage more exports. The exchange rate has remained nearly unchanged over the past 17 months. Israel's trade deficit for the first three months of the year was $2.7 billion, an increase of 50 per cent over the same period last year.

April 12:

• The Jerusalem Institute for Israel Research reported today that Jerusalem was becoming more Haredi, poorer, and older. The annual report predicted that in the year 2010, the city's population will be 817,500 with 31 per cent not Jewish, and 26 per cent Haredi.

• Israeli media carried a report that Francois Mitterrand expressed the desire to live for a period of time in Israel after his term as president of France expires. He apparently wants to write and study in Israel.

April 13:

• Responding to the call of the group of six MKs urging him to reverse his policies in Gaza, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin stated that the IDF will not be redeployed there.

April 17:

• Israel filed an official complaint with Jordan concerning the infiltration on Friday of an armed Palestinian, who reached the Dead Sea Works plant in Sdom. At the plant, the man attacked a worker. But the infiltrator was then shot by plant security guards.

Holiday spirit is evident everywhere

By CARL ALPERT

The Passover festival is the most widely observed of all holidays in Israel, with 97.8 per cent of local Jews reporting they attend a seder of one sort or another. Only 25 per cent strictly observe all the ritual requirements as laid down in the Haggadah; 53 per cent are not so fussy, but do follow a traditional format. The remainder maintain a secular attitude but recognize the week as a festival of freedom.

THE TEXTURE OF LIFE IN ISRAEL

Passover can create problems in some circles. Last year, Jerusalem's drinking water was called into question. The head of the haredi rabbinical court ruled that because the capital's water came from the Kinneret, it was not kosher for Passover since fishermen use bread as bait, and visitors threw empty beer bottles into the water.

However, former chief Rabbi Ovadia Yosef decreed the quantity of bread was so small it did not matter — citing the rule that it is batel b'shishim (less than one 60th of the mass). For those whose conscience might bother them, he advised filtering the tap water.

The holiday spirit is evident everywhere. During hol hamoed, the intermediate days, the entire population seems to take to the road, especially religious folks who do not go sightseeing on Shabbat. Scores of cultural festivals are held throughout the country. Since Passover occurs at a time of full moon, some desert areas conduct moonlight tours.

Food is of course a major element of the holiday. Supermarkets and grocery stores banish all chometz from their shelves, or enclose the offending areas with large sheets of paper or plastic coverings. Bread is nowhere to be seen. In the days immediately preceding the holiday, non-observers flock to stock up on certain products. Others who prefer their bread fresh frequent Arab restaurants or bakeries. The latter do a flourishing business in Jaffa, Jerusalem and Haifa.

On the other hand, matzah is very popular among the Arabs. Many shopkeepers report that while Jews come to buy pita, the Arabs line up to get packages of the subsidized matzah, which they consider a delicacy with jam or margarine.

During the holiday all army installations are kosher, and soldiers in the service are not permitted to receive packages from the post office lest they introduce chometz into the camps.

There are commercial aspects of the holiday as well. Note has been made of shopping sprees for toys and gifts during the days preceding the seder — reward for the "thieves" who succeed in stealing the afikomen. The spirit of these days is referred to as afikomania.

So many families get together for the seder that large numbers of apartments are unoccupied during the evening hours, an enticement for would-be thieves. However, the cautious Israeli can purchase a seder cassette. A lurking thief will not only see lights, but listening through the keyhole will hear the company singing, accompanied by the clatter of dishes and of tableware, leading him to conclude the house is filled with people.

Another enterprising merchant is selling precise imitations of loaves of bread (made of plastic) which people can use to "surprise" their guests — or their host. For that matter, the stores will offer Passover rolls which look like the real thing, but are made with matzah meal and are kosher.

Most Russians have by now learned what a seder is, but the Ethiopians have to adapt to new ground rules. Back in Ethiopia the annual house-cleaning required the entire home had to be whitewashed afresh. All clay pots had to be broken or sold to non-Jews, and new utensils acquired. Diet was also much more limited than here.

Increasingly popular among American immigrants is the American Heritage Haggadah (published by Gefen) which interlaces the traditional text with references to stories of Jewish life in the United States from the earliest days. Among other things, they learn about the George Washington seder, the U.S. Congressional hearings on the mailing of matzot, and the Matza Pardon for a prisoner of a Georgia chain gang.

Surveys show that gefilte fish has been losing its popularity. In homes where the wife is 55 or older, it is on 80 per cent of the menus. Where the wife is under 34, it is on only 36 per cent of the menus.

All El Al flights will be strictly kosher, and even non-Jews travelling the line will have to forego fresh rolls in favor of matzah.

Humor is not lacking, and the story is told annually of the time Helen Keller came across a piece of matzah. Her fingers ran over the perforated lines again and again, and finally she exclaimed: "Who wrote all this nonsense?"

WHY IS THIS NIGHT DIFFERENT?

Israel Toughens Divorce Law

Under new Israeli law, husbands who deny their wives a Get (divorce) may soon find themselves without work, a driver's license, or bank account. Chequing accounts can be restricted and the husband can be jailed up to ten years.

Israel's largest women's organization, Na'amat applauded the law which it said could help as many as 10,000 Israeli women seeking divorce.

"We fought for this law for a long time and we hope it will be enforced and used" said Na'amat President, attorney Ofra Friedman.

Jewish law requires a husband's consent to end a marriage. The Jewish religious court has sole jurisdiction over marriage and divorce in Israel. This new legislation, passed by Israel's Knesset, grants rabbinical courts extended power to persuade husbands to free their wives.

In preparation for the 4th U.N. World Conference on Women to take place in Beijing, China, September 14 - 15, 1995, a conference of International Jewish Women leaders was held in Jerusalem recently. Twenty-six countries were represented by over 200 delegates. Ofra Friedman, President of Na'amat Israel, addressed the delegates and noted that Na'amat is a political movement dedicated to advancing the status of women by pressuring and lobbying the government for change.

Beijing Women Visit Israel

Preparing to host the U.N. Conference on Women, four members of the All China Women's Federation, an umbrella organization of China's trade union movement representing 500 million members were guests of Na'amat Israel recently. With great interest, they toured Na'amat's day care centres, community centres and clubs, vocational and agricultural high schools and adult education programs. At the end of their trip, the delegates invited Na'amat representatives to visit Beijing.

to attack Israelis.

In the car, soldiers found two Kalashnikov assault rifles, an Uzi submachine gun, grenades, ammunition, and Israeli Defence Force (IDF) uniforms. A suspected explosive device in the trunk was detonated.

The three dead were identified by the IDF as Jihad Golmi, 24, Tarik Natshe, and Adel Falah. Golmi, considered the leader of the group, escaped from prison 18 months ago.

But a man who lives next door to Golmi's family said Golmi's two older brothers insist the body was not their brother's.

"They have not collected the body and are not burying it. It is the fifth time they have been asked to identify his body after an incident," Ramzy said Sunday night. No one has claimed the body.

Falah was also on the IDF's wanted list. Natshe was not known before Sunday's shooting. Another wanted member of the cell, Hamad Yarmour, was not in the car.

The Hebron cell was responsible for killing at least six Israelis and wounding 12 during the past year, the IDF said.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin called the operation a success.

Rabin said another wanted member of Hamas — Ayihya Ayyash, known as "The Engineer" — is in Gaza.

"According to the information we have, he is in Gaza. He will plan further attacks against Israeli targets, but his time will come, just as it will for every other terrorist," Rabin told reporters.

The ambush of the three cell members was a planned operation, a joint effort by the General Security Service, the IDF, and the Border Police, according to a senior IDF source.

Falah's father, Said Hassan, who was jailed for attacks on Israelis 20 years ago, as a member of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, praised his son.

Kids burned

[Cont'd. from page 1]

Three children, including two girls aged three and six, were burned in the face. All were treated at and released the same day from York Central Hospital. A visiting nurse is changing bandages daily, one parent said, adding it is too soon to know whether plastic surgery will be required.

York Region Police say they do not expect to lay charges. The Ontario Fire Marshall's Office is investigating.

"It was a freak accident," said one source, who blamed the flare-up on this year's strong wind. To prevent a recurrence, the source promised that "next year, there will be no fluid, and the children will be kept at least 3,000 feet away." —By Amy Sattin

Resolution Co.

More and more people are turning to mediation as a mutually satisfactory, inexpensive way to resolve disputes. To meet this demand, Mervyn Rosenstein's Resolution Co. offers family and business mediation, as well as arbitration.

The issues are the same as those in civil and family courts. How and when should a couple separate? How to divide family or business assets and debts? Who will the children live with? Who will support them? What makes mediation different is the approach to solutions.

Mediation works to reconcile the differences of the disputants and reach a mutually acceptable agreement. The trained mediator acts as an impartial facilitator in helping the parties reach their settlement. No one is forced to participate, or accept the mediator's solution.

The success rate is high. The very fact that participation is voluntary contributes to this success. In a child support agreement, for example, parties are more likely to abide by decisions they have voluntarily participated in.

In litigation, one party wins at the other's expense; but in mediation, no party need be a complete loser or winner. Mediation takes place in a relaxed, informal atmosphere which encourages people to settle differences; whereas in court, disputants address one another only through their lawyers, in an atmosphere of constraint.

Lawyers are essential to mediation, too, but as expert advisors on legal rights and obligations.

There are other advantages, too. Whereas litigation is public, with a great deal of personal information revealed to strangers, mediation is private and confidential. While court cases can take years and cost fortunes, family mediation usually takes a few weeks, at a moderate cost shared by the disputants. Business mediation usually takes one session.

In family mediation, when parents reach an agreement on what is best for their children, they sometimes recreate lost goodwill, which benefits the children.

As mediation cannot resolve every dispute, Rosenstein also offers arbitration, where the outcome is decided not by the conflicting parties, but the arbitrator. Traditionally used with labor problems, arbitration is now also used in many business disputes.

Rosenstein is a lawyer experienced in family, employment, commercial and estate planning law, and with practical business knowledge. He is aware of and sensitive to issues which bear on family conflict. He is fluent in English, Hebrew, Yiddish and French.

Mervyn N. Rosenstein is president of Resolution Co., and can be reached at 905-889-2069.

Fuzzion opens in Lawrence Plaza with spectacular casual wear values

The province that gave us great cuisine, joie de vivre and . . . the Montreal Canadiens has now given us another valuable export.

Aptly named Fuzzion (is this a good omen for Canadian unity?), this Quebec-based casual clothing chain "puts it all together" with exciting fashions for men and women at prices that speak the universal language of good value.

Fuzzion is excited about its foray into the Toronto market. Their stores have traditionally been based in small towns, where overhead is low. As the chain grew (the Lawrence Plaza store is their tenth), volume buying allowed them to realize even greater savings, which they passed on to their customers. But opening in a larger market doesn't mean they'll raise their prices: "Once you establish a standard, your customers expect you to maintain it."

Fuzzion is elevating that standard a notch in their grand opening sale now on at Lawrence Plaza by offering all kinds of exciting values. You'll find brand name fashions like Levi's, Guess, Buffalo, Request, Santana, Point Zero, Gasoline and others at unbelievable savings. For starters, how about Eddie Bauer shirts (reg. $49.99) at only $9.99? If it's cool summer T-shirts you're after, how about prints at three for $19.99 or solids at four for $19.99?

You'll enjoy a wide range of styles, including the trendiest items for the coming season. Big-fit pants for men and women, tight-fitted tops, jean overalls, sweat shirts . . . as well as a great selection of regular-fit jeans and jean jackets . . . they're all here in a wide range of sizes.

There's nothing "fuzzy" about the values at Fuzzion: they're clear winners.

Family-run Furrier Provides 'Full-service' Care

Kahnert Furs on Avenue Road is a family-run business that has been serving the Greater Metropolitan Toronto area since 1957. For many women, owning a fur coat provides them with a feeling of warmth, and comfort and requires special care in order to maintain its natural characteristics.

"We have always been known as a 'full service' furrier where customers can expect professional, knowledgeable, and personal advice on restyling, alterations, cleaning and repairs," says Dan Kahnert, the 4th generation of the family business.

During the hot summer months, he stresses that cold fur storage is essential to prevent the premature drying of the pelts and to preserve the natural oils in the skin. Cedar closets and air-conditioned homes simply lack the necessary cold temperatures, the proper humidity levels, and an adequate circulation of air.

At storage time, every fur is examined by one of the family, and should any repairs need attending to, free estimates are provided. It is important to look after any small repairs early on so that further damage is avoided.

Over the course of a dirty winter, furs can accumulate dust, grime, and dirt and therefore require a professional fur cleaning. Kahnert recommends that furs should be cleaned once a year or at least every two years. This special cleaning process is an effective, preventative measure that will add years of beauty and life to your furs while restoring their natural lustre and silkiness.

You may also take advantage of their trade-in policy. Kahnerts will allow you up to an additional 15 per cent off the Spring Sales prices on any new purchase when you trade in your outdated fur.

They offer a quality selection of Canada Majestic Mink, Sheared Beaver, Canadian Lynx, Sable, as well as Raccoon, Beaver, and Muskrat, in a wide range of styles, lengths, and prices.

Their selection of top quality shearling lambs and fur lined Microfibres round out their very unique and diverse product mix.

From Singles Registry to Bridal Registry

"Love at first sight is the best way to describe it" beamed an emotional Mazal Jacob as she recalled her first encounter with her now newlywed husband Raymond Kanowitz. The two met through The Jewish Singles Registry of Toronto. "She's the best thing that ever happened to me" exclaimed Raymond "we are the happiest people in the world"

Many other couples have since followed suit and the latest statistics reveal that since J.S.R.'s inception in Nov. '92, seven couples have already gotten married and/or are engaged. "We have at least 35 couples that are dating steadily at the moment" reported J.S.R director Rob Singer." More marriages are imminent and we soon plan to reach that elusive plateau set in our Montreal office of celebrating a wedding every single month."

The simplicity of the concept is the key to the J.S.R.'s success. Members get to select for themselves who they would like to meet by reviewing very detailed and comprehensive biography profiles of each other. With a photograph attached to each file it virtually eliminates any guess work. The Jewish Singles Registry is now the largest Jewish dating service in Toronto. with more than 700 members.

Singles Registry and Jewish Dateline reach formal arrangement.

In view of the recent closing of Jewish Dateline just a few weeks ago, arrangements have been made between the latter organization and the J.S.R. Former members of Jewish Dateline have been offered a special registration rate into the J.S.R. A coupon was mailed out to Dateline members who need only to present it to the J.S.R. to obtain the discount. A deadline of April 30, 1995 has been set for this promotion.

The demise of Jewish Dateline brings mixed feelings for Singer. While the organization accepts the increased role it will now play in the Jewish community it's always sad to see an established business close its doors for good. "I have nothing but praise for Debbie Cowitz from Dateline" stated Singer "she worked very hard for her members and only wanted the best for them. Her dedication to Jewish continuity is second to none".

The Jewish Singles Registry is growing at an exciting rate. It's never been easier to meet someone special. For those who are not sure if a dating service is for them, the best advise is to give Rob a call. He's easy to talk to and his heartfelt belief that this service is one of the easiest, least threatening ways to meet people, shines through with every breath. The registry is open six days a week including evening hours for your convenience. The phone number is 416-398-7068.

Public Optical Celebrates 50 Years

With the grand opening of it's newest location at the Shops on Steeles, Public Optical celebrates it's 50 years of providing quality products, excellent service, and an emphasis on superior patient care.

Founded in 1945 in Toronto, the company now has 15 locations throughout Toronto, Ottawa and Barrie with each location offering convenient one hour service on most glasses and contact lenses, eye examinations, hearing tests and hearing aids.

Louise Talbot, President, comments "Patients can choose from their favourite eyewear designers, Georgio Armani, Guess, Laura Ashley, Polo and will always enjoy the great value of everyday low prices. Our focus is on family care."

Staff assist lifestyle needs as no two patients have the same visual corrections. Safety eyewear for work, sports & hobbies, computer glasses, prescription sunglasses as well as the newest advances in invisible bifocal lenses are all available at Public Optical. (No line bifocals are easy to wear, attractive and offer intermediate vision — needed in everyday tasks that conventional bifocals are not able to correct). No matter what frames you select at Public Optical, Louise urges every customer to invest in anti-reflection coatings on the lenses. Ideal for eyeglass wearers who work at computer terminals and/or do a lot of night driving, this remarkable process eliminates virtually all glare and makes the lenses appear completely invisible.

Contact lenses are also very popular, with disposable lenses continuing to be the most successful. Johnson & Johnson ACUVUE lenses, are perfect for patients who want to enjoy great visual acuity, comfort and convenience.

Public Optical has on its staff, certified contact lens experts who can also custom fit lenses for astigmatic patients, as well as bifocal lenses.

Equally popular are disposable colored lenses from Wesley Jessen. "These disposable lenses are a great way to test all the colours" says Louise . Many of our patients wear clear disposable lenses most of the time and then switch over to colored lenses for special occasions.

The company has prided itself on quality products and personal attention. Staff have been carefully chosen at many locations to meet the needs of the community, often speaking a variety of languages. "Specialized training, and a dedicated committment to exceeding patient expectations is our main goal," comments Louise Talbot, owner. While the products must be the best, so must our service. "Our real assets are our people."

From May 1 until the end of June this year, Public Optical will be celebrating 50 years of service. This Grand Celebration will feature such attractions as back-to-1945 pricing on some items, like contact lens cleaner at 50 cents. Also, there will be $50 off any purchase of complete glasses and/or contact lenses, and free colored contact lenses.

Steeles Memorial Chapel 68 Years of Community Involvement

Steeles Memorial Chapel was founded in 1927 as a community organization, to provide the Jewish public with dignified funerals at a reasonable cost. The earliest locations were in the heart of the Jewish community at the time, first on Bathurst St., then nearby on College St. When the community moved north, so did College Memorial Chapel, changing its name to Steeles Memorial Chapel to mark the move.

During the almost seven decades since its founding, Steeles Memorial has broadened its mandate to include ongoing support of many charities and institutions. All members of the Board of Trustees are representatives of Jewish organizations.

Although it is financially self-supporting, Steeles Memorial Chapel does not keep one penny of its profits. Once staff, maintenance and operating expenses have been accounted for, every cent of every remaining dollar is donated to charity. Members of the Board of Trustees are all volunteers from community organizations.

Among the Jewish organizations to which Steeles donates money are ORT, the Reena Foundation, the Dr. Ronald Feld Fund for Syrian Jewry, the Jewish Russian Community Centre, the Jewish Public Library, Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, and Chabad Lubavitch of Ontario. Schools, yeshivot, camps and synagogues are also among the beneficiaries.

Besides donating to organizations, Steeles Memorial offers help to needy families and individuals on an informal basis, with money for Shabbat meals, or meals for the Seder and other religious festivals. Steeles also buys phylacteries for indigent people, and supplies Meals on Wheels to the sick and aged.

For the benefit of Jewish hospital patients, Steeles has set in motion a plan to open chapels in hospitals. Currently they are building two, one at Sunnybrook and another at Branson. In time, they hope to provide every hospital in Toronto with a Jewish chapel.

At present, the Board of Trustees are also looking into the idea of a chapel at Toronto International Airport, so that observant Jews can daven Mincha and Maariv in the evening and Shacharit in the morning, or say Kaddish. In addition, such a chapel would make it easier for Jews from out of town to establish connections with the Toronto community.

Steeles Memorial also sees itself as part of the larger Canadian society. Donations are made to non-Jewish charities, such as the Salvation Army, the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, the AIDS Committee of Toronto, the Canadian Cancer Society, the Canadian Diabetes Society, and a number of other medical research foundations. Moreover, Steeles donates to Toronto General, Toronto Western, the Hospital for Sick Children and many other hospitals in the Toronto area.

It is the policy of the Board of Trustees that if a Jewish child under 18 dies, there is no cost for the funeral. At such a time, says Executive Director Ken Bowdenstein, grief and the disorientation that comes from loss are more than enough to deal with; the family does not need any other problems. No other Jewish funeral chapel in North America has this policy.

In sum, Steeles Memorial is involved in every aspect of Jewish life, and at the same time innovative in its approach to tzedakah. While resources are not bottomless, no worthy cause goes unconsidered; and new ideas in charitable work are constantly being looked at.

Steeles is sensitive to the needs of the living. Currently, for example, a bereavement committee is being planned, to counsel people through grief and mourning, so that they will find it easier to reclaim their lives.

To put it in plain words: every funeral which goes to Steeles Memorial is also helping a large number and variety of worthy causes. Not only is the deceased kept alive in name, so are many organizations which improve the quality of life for the poor, the sick, children and the aged.

Steeles Memorial believes it is essential to offer options and flexibility to the bereaved. Full service is available, in which Steeles will handle every detail that must be dealt with. Alternatively, they can offer more modest, more affordable arrangements. Every attention is paid to the wishes of the bereaved.

Whatever the choice, one thing isnot flexible: all funerals are in strict accord with halachic tradition.

The President of Steeles Memorial is Mike Rogow; the Executive Director is Ken Bowdenstein. Steeles Memorial Chapel is located at 350 Steeles Avenue West, in Thornhill. For information please call (905) 881-6003 or (416) 733-2000.

Mr. Car Care:

Quality Cosmetics For Your Car

Mr. Car Care is a fully insured hand-care car cleaning service, providing a full range of "car cosmetics". Owner Mitch Rabovsky washes and waxes; he cleans interiors as well as exteriors, and reconditions leather and upholstery; he can even remove dent stains and minor light scratches and rust on top of the chrome. All this, moreover, is done with environmentally friendly products.

"I also make house calls, " says Mitch, who will work either at your home, office or his wash bay. He will pick up and deliver your car.

"Quality, not quantity, is what matters," says Mitch. "For my own satisfaction, I have to satisfy the customer."

After getting the experience he needed, Mitch opened Mr. Car Care in November of 1993. He now has about 100 repeat customers, including between ten and 20 who bring their car in about every two weeks. Mitch recommends hand washing about twice a month, and waxing about three times a year.

While he hires University students in the summer, and enjoys giving them the opportunity, he does everything himself in the winter--and does it by hand, right down to the waxing. In the summer, he enjoys working outside.

"I take a little longer than some people," Mitch says, " because I'm careful." Even proponents of the cliche that "perfection is impossible" have to admit that Mitch gets close to it. In over two years in business, he has had only one minor complaint, which he fixed on the spot.

While most of his business is residential, Mr. Car Care serves all types of customer, and owners of all types and makes of automobile. His business and corporate customers include Fletcher-Davis and Greenhouse Graphics. There are discounts for volume and frequency.

Although he has a degree in psychology and philosophy, Mitch always knew he belonged in the business world. At the same time, he believes a balanced life is the key to happiness and success. He is an enthusiastic traveller and active sports participant, and has aspirations to make the Canadian Maccabi baseball team.

Mitch also has a window washing service for homes and businesses, and is thinking in the long term of expanding into a general home and car care service. His ultimate goal is to own a restaurant, with himself as chef, and an attached car wash.

Mr. Car Care is at Woodbine and Steeles. To arrange to have your car cared for, by appointment only, phone Mitch Rabovsky at (905) 709-0213.

Firm pushes Mideast economic interdependence

By JOSEPH SERGE
CJN Business Editor

TORONTO — Peace in the Middle East can be maintained through economic cooperation between adversaries, Daniel Lubetzky believes.

To shape his theory into a practical plan, Lubetzky founded PeaceWorks Inc. The company, whose goal is to support peace in volatile regions, was incorporated a year ago.

"PeaceWorks supports cooperation between adversaries, by finding and supporting products [usually cosmetics, food or textiles] suitable to be produced by people from different backgrounds," Lubetzky said from his New York office.

"We look for a company that fits our criteria and see if there's any interest," Lubetzky said. "We get them to sign a letter agreeing to buy raw materials from each other."

He said he looks for companies that can hire laborers and managers equally from the two countries involved in the agreement. "Ideally the company will be owned by both Jews and Arabs," he said.

He believes that as neighbors become economically interdependent, the stakes become too great for them to break off the relationship.

The most important criterion he uses to determine whether a company is suitable for PeaceWorks support is mutual cooperation.

"Ideally we look for a symmetrical relationship on all levels [from ownership to materials]. You can make it worse if you promote a master/slave relationship. There has to be interdependence not dependence."

Improving racial tolerance

Lubetzky admits it is difficult to achieve perfection. Some companies are only interested in PeaceWorks to get their product exported.

"We stay away from them. It's a judgment call and we have to see how deeply committed [to his plan] they are," he said.

Through other companies, PeaceWorks provides financial support and marketing assistance to its ventures. "For instance, Israeli product packaging is not up to Western standards. We help design new packages and pay for the costs."

Most importantly, PeaceWorks imports the goods into the United States and helps penetrate the lucrative North American market.

PeaceWorks is trying to develop contacts in Canada, Lubetzky said.

Five per cent of PeaceWorks' profits is earmarked for the Peace Project, a tolerance-development educational program created by PeaceWorks.

With help from the Centre for Jewish and Arab Economic Development, the Peace Project is developing a series of excercises designed to improve racial tolerance between workers.

"We try to get the workers to realize we are all human beings and to promote understanding between both peoples," Lubetzky said.

At first this program will be limited to PeaceWorks ventures, but the plan is to eventually offer it to other interested companies.

PeaceWorks' first venture was Moshe Pupik and Ali Mishmunken's World Famous, a gourmet line of food sauces imported from the Middle East. The line of all natural, certified Kosher and additive-free gourmet food was launched last December.

The World Famous line which includes sun-dried tomato "spraté" (a mixture of sauce-spread-paste-paté), green olive "spraté," basil pesto, filled olives, olive seasoning (olives dried in the sun and ground into a spice) and extra virgin olive oil.

All items marketed under the World Famous label are produced in Israel through cooperative efforts between Jews and Arabs.

One of the latest projects being undertaken by PeaceWorks is Salam Sweets, a maker of halvah owned by a Jew and an Arab who became friends in Haifa.

Lubetzky is looking to other areas to implement his program, and is currently trying to promote his ideas in Mexico and South Africa.

"But my passion is the Middle East," he said. (He studied at the Begin-Sadat Centre for Strategic Studies at Bar-Ilan University in Israel.) "Israel needs peace to survive economically."

Lubetzky is a director of the U.S. branch of Info-Prod/METIC, the Middle East Trade and Investment Centre, and has written several articles about Arab-Israeli cooperation and confidence building measures.

Restrictions Lifted On Foreign Investment

JERUSALEM — Israeli firms are now allowed to invest abroad without restrictions, buy foreign stocks and hold bank deposits abroad, the Bank of Israel has announced.

The only restriction on financial holdings will be that they not exceed 10 per cent of their net worth or five per cent of their sales, whichever is greater. In addition to Israeli stocks traded abroad, the companies will be able to purchase foreign securities that are recognized by the Bank of Israel.

In addition, limits on local firms' capital investments will be eliminated. Until now, firms were only allowed to invest 40 per cent of their net worth abroad.

Israel-China Reach Investment Agreement

JERUSALEM — Israeli Finance Minister Avraham Shohat and Chinese Foreign Trade and Economic Cooperation Minister Wu Yi signed an investment protection treaty and an agreement to extend a $150-million (US) line of credit to Israeli companies investing in China, the Treasury reported last week.

Treasury officials have emphasized the importance of the treaty following the difficulties foreign investors have had with Chinese authorities.

The treaty protects investors from both countries against discrimination and acts that will decrease the value of their investments.

Real estate broker David Eichorn was recently called to sell an estate home which had been for sale privately for some time.

When Eichorn asked the family who had given them his name, they told him nobody had.

"They were impressed with the fact that I was the only real estate agent [in their area] who didn't call them to list the house," he said. "They said, 'You must be busy selling.' "

You won't find Eichorn or his wife and associate Esther knocking on anyone's door trying to solicit business. "We don't have to knock on doors. We have a loyal following," Eichorn said. "People know us and trust us, and refer us to family and friends."

He said they don't have time to solicit listings because they spend their time finding buyers for the homes they list. Because they sell most of their own listings, the Eichorns said they can be more flexible with the commissions. "We'll never lose a deal because of commission."

Eichorn said he is willing to share his expertise with clients and advise them on whether it is better to renovate a house or put it on the market. "On occasion we tell clients that it makes more economic sense to upgrade their home than to move."

When clients list their homes, they expect good service, and allocating money for advertising to give the home good exposure is part of that service, Eichorn explained, saying he spends heavily on advertising and skimps on fancy offices.

The Eichorns work out of a simple storefront office at Bathrust and Glencairn where clients often drop in for cookies and to schmooze.

All the listings — the homes are on a computerized multiple listing service — are written on white marker boards in the office.

"You come in. You see it all. It's all [the listings] up there on the wall," Eichorn said.

He went into real estate in 1987 — at the height of the boom — and was busy from the moment he got his licence. "I couldn't handle it myself," he said, so he asked Esther to help out.

Eichorn, a licensed broker, worked for other real estate brokers before setting up his own company in 1994.

He said the secret to his success is good service and hard work. "We have no gimmicks. We just give plain down to earth good old fashioned service." The Eichorns also said they thank G-d for their success.

A natural kibitzer, Eichorn said he and Esther didn't have to attend motivation classes to develop a strong work ethic; they had no choice. "We have a large family and a stack of bills to go with it."

Eichorn said it's a good time to buy houses. "There's a nice selection of houses in all price ranges."

But he can't make any predictions about the future of real estate prices. "Those who say, don't know and those who know, don't say," he quipped.

Job Search is a monthly column dedicated to job searching techniques by employment counsellor Lisa Galet. Readers are invited to forward any questions on this topic to Job Search c/o The CJN.

Everyone knows someone who is graduating from university or high school this spring, many of whom are eager to join the ranks of the employed. The competition for jobs is fierce so a strong resume is an important part of securing a job.

In the last article we began a look at resumes. The resume is an introduction to a potential employer. In a resume you list the companies you have worked for, how long you were there, and what your title was. You should note what city your employer was in, and if that company is unknown in the local marketplace, you may want to include a line about what the company does.

A brief description of the major five or six tasks you did in that job lets a prospective employer know you did tasks that may fall under another title in another company.

Descriptions should be in point form. If you have supervised workers, were they laborers, secretaries, engineers? If you have managed accounts receivable-payable, what was the size of the files? About how much money were you responsible for? Did you do your calculations manually or on computer? If you used a computer to assist you with your work, what programs do you know? If you have worked with money, how much? Answering these questions gives the resume substance.

Most employers only want to look at your recent work experience. Any work done over 15 years ago need not be on your resume. Work experience before the advent of computers is not really relevant to most work opportunities today. You should only put an item from then on your resume if you have just left that job.

If most of your education was over 20 years ago, you do not need to put that on your resume either, unless you are a professional with a designation requiring professional education. That must be on the resume as well as any continuing education courses.

For those new graduates with very little work experience, put your educational experience before your work experience. List the title of the degree, where it is from and when you graduated. Listing your high school is fine but you do not need to list your elementary school. If you plan to return to school in the fall, you can indicate that you are still enroled in the program.

On your resume remember to write down volunteer as well as paid positions. This is particularly important for those people who have not worked while raising children or for students who have little work experience. Time spent organizing parents' association events or fundraising for the hospital is excellent experience to put on your resume.

If you are a recent graduate or if you know one, sit down with these instructions and review your resume. If you still are not confident about your resume or the type of job you should be looking for, go see an employment counsellor. Help can be found in the form of resume writing and learning more about work options.

Israel programming on offer

By ADI WAKSMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Curious individuals of all ages and backgrounds gathered last week at the Leah Posluns Theatre to learn about Israel travel in an event billed as "a shuk (market) full of Israel programs under one roof."

Sponsored by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto's Israel Experience committee, the Israel Sunday event featured 15 exhibitors ranging from summer tours to job opportunities, volunteer opportunities, university, religious studies and others.

Chetz Vakeshet, open to 14-18 year olds, is a 5½-week program designed to give students a taste of army life. "It's not the typical tourist thing," said Chetz Vakeshet alumni Yoni Rachamim. Participants learn combat tactics and how to handle firearms. The programs cost $4,380.

For those wanting a taste of kibbutz life, The Kibbutz Aliya desk offered summer and year-long programs for 18- to 30-year-olds starting at $2,605. "It's extremely inexpensive" insisted shaliach Barry Praag.

Those looking for a scholarly experience could choose from B'nei Akiva's Mach Hach Ba'aretz summer tour or the Midrash U'maaseh yeshivah program. Both emphasize Jewish studies but combine classes with touring and other activities.

There were volunteer work programs through Volunteers for Israel, Project Oztma and Livnot U'Lehibanot. The programs, ranging from three weeks to a year, involve participants in a number of "nation-building" projects and are open to a wide range of ages.

Representatives from Bar-Ilan University, Hebrew University and Tel-Aviv University were present in full force to recruit second- and third-year university students. "We have the largest overseas program," said Michael Litvack, from Canadian Friends of Hebrew University. "We're also the only school to offer volunteer programs and special internships that can be carried out at the Knesset, Ministry of Justice and the Bank of Israel."

Even those searching for a more permanent experience had the chance to drop by the Israel Aliyah Centre booth and talk to Udi Savion about job opportunities and training programs provided to olim.

Although organizer Mark Rubenstein said Israel Sunday was a success, "next year we'll hold the event much earlier. I saw more people walk through than I expected and that's a sign there is a need for such programs. Next year we'll make the event bigger and better."

Books to guide itinerant travellers

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

If you're planning a trip in Canada or abroad, the following guidebooks may be of interest:

Birnbaum's Canada (HarperCollins, $25) is a sound primer on a great tourist destination, with information on places, hotels, restaurants and festivals.

Birnbaum's Montreal & Quebec City (HarperCollins, $16.75) delves into cities which offer travellers a taste of Western Europe.

The Canadian Traveller's Diary (Raincoast Books, $9.95) is an ideal travelling companion, containing space for itineraries, jottings and addresses. In addition, the phone numbers of Canadian embassies are listed in alphabetical order.

Birnbaum's New York (HarperCollins, $16.75) delivers the goods, giving a reader a tantalizing overview of the Big Apple.

Fortification and the Synagogue (Weidenfeld & Nicolson, no Canadian price listed) is a beautiful coffee-table volume about one of the most fascinating tourist sites in Cairo — the Ben-Ezra synagogue. Edited by Phyllis Lambert, this lavishly-illustrated book is a cogent account of the synagogue's history and recent renovation.

Mediterranean Europe (Raincoast Books, $29.95) offers insights into 17 countries, some which are not even on the European continent (Morocco, Tunisia and Cyprus).

Anti-Semitism Explored in Vienna: An exhibition organized by the Jewish Museum of the City of Vienna, and due to open soon in a section of Vienna City Hall, focuses on the enduring problem of anti-Semitism in Europe.

The exhibit presents a variety of recurrent anti-Semitic images in paintings, objects and documents that reflect the prejudice of the wider population rather than any accurate reality of the Jewish people. The main objective is to represent the "power of the image" in the centuries-old phenomenon of Jew-hatred in Europe. On display from April 27 through July 23. Telephone: 43-1-535-04-31.

Freedom Bells Ring in Norway: Church bells throughout Norway are set to chime on May 8 to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the liberation of Norway from the five-year Nazi occupation that ended only with Germany's capitulation in 1945. A planned exhibit at the century-old Norwegian Folk Museum in Oslo will focus on life during the occupation. Items on display include personal memorabilia of Norwegians who lived through that dark time. On May 3, King Harald and Queen Sonja are scheduled to visit Hammerfest in northern Norway, where the Nazi troops set fire to all the buildings in their retreat. As well, Norwegians plan to unveil a 59-foot national monument in tribute to the Allies in Narvik on May 7.

Norwegians led a notable campaign of resistance against the Nazis. In December 1942, U.S. President Franklin D. Roosevelt thundered: "If there is anyone who still wonders why this war is being fought, let him look to Norway. If there is anyone who doubts the democratic will to win, again I say, let him look to Norway."

Travellers on Norwegian trains can purchase a variety of money-saving rail passes including the Norway Rail Pass, Scan Rail passes and Eurail passes. Many travellers prefer to experience the dramatic scenery of Western Norway on bicycle; if you are one, contact Gerhard's Bicycle Odysseys, 503-223-2402. Film and Music in Switzerland: Planning a Swiss vacation? Keep in mind that the Tibor Varga classical music festival gets underway in Sion on July 7 and runs to Sept. 13. Cinema lovers, take note that the Locarno International Film Festival runs August 3 to 13; this year's fest is devoted to celebrating film's first century, and features many retrospectives. A festival of films portraying the Swiss Alpine region runs in Les Diablerets, Sept. 25 to Oct. 1.

Tangled Fish Nets and Red Tape: Since the beginning of the month, Canadians intending to visit Spain have required visas, a bureaucratic formality imposed by Spain as punishment for Canada's endeavoring to protect the fish stocks in the high seas off Newfoundland. Reports are rife of travellers rushing out to get passport-type photos at the last minute, even of cancelling trips. Canadians may be inconvenienced through such red-tape requirements, but Spain's Iberian Airlines and tourist industry are suffering even more.

Earlier this month, the Spanish Embassy in Ottawa and Iberian Airlines did everything they could to help a group of 360 people from IGA Canada attain visas in only 48 hours. "They assisted us in getting the visas," reports corporate travel planner Kim Simpson. "They knew that otherwise they would have had 360 people not going anywhere."

The ongoing "turbot war" between Canada and Spain is the most recent example of the necessity for travellers to keep informed of political developments that could impinge on their travel plans.

Jewish Film Festival previews

A scene from Like A Bride.

The third annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival gets under way May 4 at the Bloor Cinema. Staff writer Sheldon Kirshner previews three films. Further reviews will appear in the forthcoming editions.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Guita Schyfter's Like A Bride is a rarity in Mexican cinema — a film with a distinct Jewish voice.

Scheduled to be screened on May 7 at 5:30 p.m., Like A Bride turns on the coming of age of two strong-headed Jewish women — Oshinica (Oshi), a Sephardi, and Rifke, an Ashkenzi.

The two-hour movie covers all the bases: Jewish tradition, ethnicity, acculturation, Zionism, the Holocaust and anti-Semitism. It is a fine film, powered by a plausible script and deft acting.

Though largely set in the 1950s and 1960s, it begins as Oshi's Turkish grandparents arrive in Mexico in 1927.

The scene shifts to a crowded neighborhood in Mexico City, where Oshi grows up under the protective influence of her conservative, middle-class parents. Unbeknown to them, Oshi, an impressionable young thing, is taken to mass by the family maid, with all its attendant consquences.

Meanwhile, Rifke (Maya Mishalska), the daughter of Holocaust survivors, feels the weight of her Jewish identity and the pull of Mexican culture.

Schyfter develops these and other themes quite skillfully. And her portrait of Jewish life in Mexico, especially Sephardi, seems authentic.

Mina Tannenbaum, due to be screened on May 4 at 7:30 p.m., is a French film directed by Martine Dugowson. It is the story of an enduring relationship between two friends.

They are Mina (Romane Bohringer) and Ethel Benegui (Elsa Zylberstein), both of whom struggle to assert themselves in the face of an inferiority complex about their looks.

Eventually, they blossom into attractive, accomplished women. Mina becomes a painter; Ethel, a journalist. But as they develop into intelligent, independent human beings, they find the pursuit of love and success daunting.

As well, Mina and Ethel discover that jealousy can intrude into even the most balanced friendship.

By turns poignant, humorous and downright tragic, Mina Tannenbaum unfolds through flashbacks, evoking the Paris of the 1970s onward. Bohringer and Zylberstein acquit themselves with elan.

Kurt Weill (1900-1950), the brilliant German-Jewish composer, is the subject of Larry Weinstein's hard-edged documentary, September Songs: The Music of Kurt Weill, to be shown on May 7 at 8:20 p.m.

Jointly produced by German television, the CBC and Telefilm Canada, this is a stylish tribute to Weill's life and music.

The "Forgotten" Jews of Yesha: What's life really like in Judea, Samaria and Gaza? What does it feel like to be boycotted by every major Jewish charity, as Jews in these territories have been recently? A new video produced by the Yesha Council of Jewish Communities in Judea, Samaria and Gaza sets out to answer these questions. The Forgotten Jews of Yesha offers a glimpse into the world of an 11-year-old girl named Shira who lives in the town of Ofra, one of the more than 140,000 Jews of Judea, Samaria and Gaza. As Shira remarks, "I think Americans get the wrong ideas about us." For a copy of this documentary, call 212-276-1748 or write to the One Israel Fund, 17 East 45th St., New York N.Y. 10017.

D. H. Lawrence: The Story of a Marriage by Brenda Maddox, Simon & Schuster $36.00

In 1912, Frieda von Richthofen (Baron Manfred von Richthofen, the star of the German air war in World War I, dubbed the "Red Baron," was her cousin) left her husband and three children to elope with David Herbert Lawrence aged 26, the outspoken, fledgling British writer.

This match couldn't have been made in heaven. Frieda was six years his senior, of German aristocratic stock, sexually free and adventurous and physically robust. Lawrence, on the other hand, was sickly, the son of a humble Midlands miner, ambivalent and uncertain about his sexuality and consumed with a passion for writing.

They were constantly on the move — Europe, America, Australia, Mexico — almost always short of money and their childless, turbulent marriage was never less than passionate and stormy. Periods of tranquil domesticity alternated with astonishing bouts of mutual, verbal and physical abuse. In fits of rage, Lawrence would beat his wife who often responded in kind. Their friends were appalled at the intensity of their antagonism but astonished at how quickly the volatile couple was reconciled. Obviously, they needed each other and over the 18 years of their marriage — until Lawrence died in 1930 at the age of 45 — their love-hate relationship was both enervating and replenishing.

The author of this lengthy and engrossing biography of Lawrence, with special emphasis on the role of Frieda on his life and work follows them on their travels across four continents and dissects their tangled relationship with friends from literary and intellectual circles.

Given his unsettled life, poor health and troubling penury, Lawrence's literary output was prodigious. He never stopped working and novels, short stories, essays, books on travel poured forth unceasingly from his pen.

There is no denying his impressive literary achievement, but his concept of the supreme importance of the individual and sex as a creative affirmation of life were mingled with unstable and quirky notions about blood consciousness and the "dark," mysterious, instinctive, sensual knowledge of life. It is no wonder that Bertrand Russell, once a good friend, maintained that some of his ideas "led straight to Auschwitz."

In many ways he was a disagreeable person and has been accused, with some justification, of misogyny, racism, ingratitude and callousness. He rejected democracy as well as the political equality of the sexes.

Maddox indicates that Lawrence "spoke with the casual anti-Semitism common to his day. There is no disguising that he saw Jews as very alien — but, ugly as some of his remarks appear to later generations, his was in no sense a blind bigotry, as some of his enduring friendships prove. "His collected letters show feelings of both closeness as well as animosity to Jews and Judaism. His brother-in-law Edgar Jaffe (a German professor of Economics), married to Frieda's older sister Elsa was disliked by the anti-Semitic Richthofens who, nevertheless, showed no reluctance about benefiting from his money after his death.

It is difficult in our era of sexual permissiveness to understand the outrage occasioned by some of his books. His frankness about sex and use of four-letter words kept him in constant trouble with the law. His last novel, Lady Chatterly's Lover (1928), caused a furore and was not published in unexpurgated form in the United States and England until 30 years later.

Lawrence's life has been examined many times, but Maddox explores the man and his work from the perspective of the 1990s and adds a new dimension to our understanding and appreciation. At the end, however, he remains an enigmatic personality — a many-sided figure of paradox and contraction — but undoubtedly one of the major literary influences of our age.

Play's reading evokes emotional response

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — At a recently staged Winnipeg reading of a play based on the best-seller None is Too Many, an elderly woman in the audience was moved to shout "you bastard" at a heartless Canadian immigration official portrayed on stage.

The response did not surprise Kayla Gordon, artistic director of the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre (WJT), which needs a co-producer for a Toronto run.

"There was intense interest in None is Too Many," Gordon said. "We expected 100 people at the reading in Rosh Pina Synagogue but 350 showed up and we had to transfer it to a larger space."

Toronto playwright Jason Sherman is working on the final script and WJT is planning to give it a full production at the 300-seat Warehouse Threatre in the fall of 1996.

Funded through a Canada Council grant, the WJT first invited Toronto theatre director and performer Joel Greenberg to write the script. Sherman took over when Greenberg withdrew for personal reasons.

Gordon said Irving Abella and Harold Troper, the authors of the book, have seen the unfinished versions of the script.

"We would be thrilled to bring it to Toronto," she said. "The subject is particularly timely now."

Those in the Winnipeg production directed by Kim McCaw were Terri Cherniak, Richard Hurst, Arne McPherson, Rick Chafe and Kayla Gordon.

Canadian cruelty dramatized

The characters include Frederick Charles Blair, the deputy minister of immigration who denied Jewish refugees entry to Canada; Prime Minister Mackenzie King; U.S. President Franklin Delano Roosevelt; three Jewish MPs; an average Joe Canadian; a Viennese refugee who must convert to Christianity to be allowed into Canada; and the late Saul Hayes of the Canadian Jewish Congress.

Sherman has combined the real world of Ottawa politics with fictional elements to dramatize the inhumanity and cruelness of the Canadian government towards Jewish refugees.

Author uses Midrashic style

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Montreal writer Edeet Ravel is not one to give up easily.

Her first book, Lovers: A Midrash, was rejected by 17 Canadian publishers houses before it was finally accepted by Nuage Editions.

"I didn't feel personally rejected. But I did feel discouraged about ever getting it published," Ravel told The CJN recently while in Toronto promoting Lovers, which was released in November.

Ravel, 39, a lecturer in Midrash, Hebrew and Yiddish literature at McGill University, took a break from teaching to join a week-long promotion for seven Montreal anglophone writers organized by two Montreal-based publishers.

The writers gave 10 readings in six days at universities and pubs in Ottawa, Kingston, Peterborough and Toronto. One of the Toronto readings was taped by CBC radio for The Arts Tonight, while in Ottawa, the group met with MP Sheila Finestone, secretary of state for culture.

"Promoting the book has been hectic, but it's part of the process. You have to do it," Ravel said. "[The tour has] given me a lot of incentive to continue with my current novel and short stories."

She said her readings have been so well-received by audiences that she sold all the books she brought with her for the tour."I had no idea how [the book] would go over. I didn't expect such enthusiasm."

The unusual style of Lovers — a combination of prose and poetry — was influenced by Midrash, Ravel said.

"I was enthralled by the form of Midrash which was so different from anything I'd seen written ... The sages created text that the reader has to solve like a puzzle ... There are clues, but the reader creates the solution."

The stories in Lovers are set in both contemporary and biblical times. Ravel said she applied Midrashic style to the modern situations and inserted modern themes to interpret the lives of the sages, the writers of the Midrash.

She said she became fascinated with Midrash when she was a graduate student in the Department of Jewish Studies at McGill University, and she ended up doing her doctorate on it.

Lovers, which won the Nora Epstein award in 1991, a University of Toronto prize for the best unpublished student manuscript in drama or poetry, was published in Hebrew two years ago.

Lovers: A Midrash is available at Negev, Israel's and the World's Biggest Book Store.

War crimes case adjourned

BY PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There has been yet another delay in the effort to bring alleged Nazi war criminals to justice.

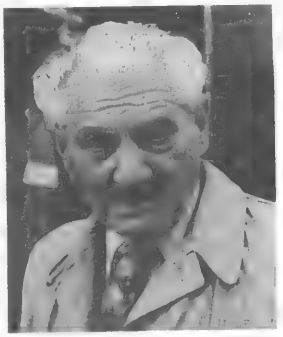
On Monday, Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) adjudicator Ed McNamara postponed the case involving suspected Nazi war criminal Joseph Nemsila to May 31 after Nemsila appeared at a deportation hearing without a lawyer.

"I have no money. I am a very poor man," Nemsila said in halting English. "I had a Slovak lawyer [in other proceedings] but he is running away from me. He is afraid."

McNamara met with Nemsila after the hearing to give him a list of Legal Aid lawyers.

A further delay may result when the hearing reconvenes. Justice Department lawyer Christopher Amerasinghe, who led the prosecution against Imre Finta, said it would take until the end of June to obtain a certified translation of legal documents into the Slovak language.

Monday's proceedings were slowed when Nemsila had difficulty understanding McNamara, even with the help of a Slovak interpreter. Later Nemsila appeared bewildered by the television lights and a torrent of questions from reporters as he left the downtown immigration offices.



Joseph Nemsila

The Department of Immigration and Citizenship alleges Nemsila entered Canada by fraudulent means or by misrepresenting his wartime activities. Nemsila, who lives in Oshawa, is a permanent resident of Canada and a citizen of the former Czechoslovakia.

Although the department declined to give further details, Nemsila confirmed to CTV News that he was a member of the Hlinka Guard, the Slovak equivalent of the German SS.

Nemsila told CTV he didn't hide his membership in the pro-Nazi organization and that he planned to fight the deportation. "My order was to go against the uprisers and put the uprisers down," he said. "I am not guilty. I am not involved personally in anything."

Sol Littman, Canadian head of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, said beginning in 1958 Czechoslovakia twice requested Nemsila's deportation for war crimes. "Canada made no response to that whatsoever." Littman said he provided evidence about Nemsila's wartime activites to Canadian authorities in 1982 but again nothing resulted.

In an interview with reporters several days before Monday's hearing, Nemsila said the Jews were behind efforts to see him deported. "The Jews, the Jews, they will never change...If it will not stop at me it will go farther, they will go after the other people," he said.

Militias' racism tracked

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The anti-government state militias and paramilitary groups linked to the Oklahoma City bombing have a long and frightening history of anti-Semitism, say American Jewish organizations.

Researchers who have tracked the U.S. extremists say hatred of Jews and dark conspiracies by Zionists form the philosophical underpinnings of their movement. Well-armed U.S. militias claim "that Jews and 'international bankers' are behind a repressive 'New World Order.' The idea of ordinary people being victimized by secret government conspiracies reflects the tenor, if not the content, of the [forged anti-Semitic tract] Protocols of the Elders of Zion," according to Militias: A Growing Danger, a report by the American Jewish Committee (AJC).

Canadian violence feared

Two paramilitary groups in Michigan and Arizona have become the focus of the April 19 bombing, which left scores dead and many more trapped in the federal building's ruins.

"Nonetheless," the AJC report continues, "the targets of the more extreme militia groups are not exclusively or even primarily Jews or other minorities. Environmentalists are also vilified. But most despised are government officials."

Jews are seen by many of the extremists as an evil force behind government, the report notes.

The militias, often made up of white supremacists and assorted racists, represent "a new manifestation of violent hate-group activity that

Mayor's Proclamation

TORONTO — Toronto Mayor Barbara Hall last week proclaimed April 27 — Yom Hashoah — as Holocaust Remembrance Day.

"The horrors of the Holocaust must never be forgotten. All members of our society must acknowledge and remember the loved ones and communities which perished; the difficulties Holocaust survivors had in rebuilding their broken lives; and many brave and dedicated people who fought valiantly for the defeat of Nazism and victory in Europe." Hall said in a statement.

Gazette Notes Omission

MONTREAL — The Gazette has admitted it failed to note the anti-Semitic nature of a photograph it published April 13.

The wire-service photo showed a group of protesting workers in Moscow holding a placard that showed drawings of Russian President Boris Yeltsin and U.S. President Bill Clinton wearing kippot, with a Star of David between them. Neither the caption nor the accompanying story made any mention of anti-Semitism.

Two days later, Gazette ombudsman Robert Walker wrote that the paper regretted the omission and that the photo should never have been published.

Historical Society Meets

MONTREAL — The Canadian Jewish Historical Society will hold its annual conference in Montreal May 28 and 29

The meeting will take place at the Université du Québec à Montréal, in conjunction with the annual Conference of Canadian Learned Societies.

Sessions will examine anti-Semitism in Canada, recent books in Canadian Jewish studies, the campaign for Syria Jewry and the future of Jews in Quebec.

A highlight, says society president Prof. Ira Robinson, will be a tribute to former Canadian Jewish Congress archivist David Rome.

For details, call Robinson at 514-848-2066.

ISRAEL

Protest Rally

JERUSALEM — More than 7,000 demonstrators participated last Monday in a march against government policy.

The march across the narrowest part of the country was meant to illustrate Israel's vulnerability if the government cedes control of the territories.

The 16-km march was organized by the Likud, National Religious Party, Tsomet and Moledet.

Labor Threatens MKs

JERUSALEM — The Labor Party last week threatened to take action against four of its MKs if they help the opposition Likud pass legislation to prevent ceding the Golan Heights to Syria.

The legislation was tabled last Monday as a private member's bill by Likud MK Uzi Landau. The four Labor MKs had originally proposed the same bill but the party forbade them from submitting it.

The party warned that if the MKs support the bill, it will be "safe to assume" they would not be allowed to stand in the next primaries as Knesset candidates.

Jews Pray at Caves

JERUSALEM — Under heavy police guard, hundreds of Jews prayed last Monday at the Machpela Cave in Hebron.

It was the first time Jews were exclusively allowed at the site for the day since the new security procedures were drafted, following the commission of inquiry into the Hebron massacre of February 1994.

Sephardi Chief Rabbi Eliahu Bakshi-Doron praised the decision to open the entire site to Jews during Passover.

Interfaith Seder

JERUSALEM — Jews joined Buddhists, Hindus, Muslims and Christians last week for a seder at Beit Shmuel, the cultural and educational centre of Israel's Reform movement.

A representative of each faith was asked to give a special prayer in the spirit of Passover. In keeping with environmental awareness, the meal was entirely vegetarian.

Motorcycle Unit Launched

JERUSALEM — This city's new police anti-terrorism motorcycle unit officially went into action last week amid questions about its potential effectiveness.

Police brass hope putting officers armed with M-16s on high-powered motorcycles will permit quick response to terrorism attacks.

But police brass concede the unit has its problems, including the difficulty of firing a weapon from a motorcycle and the fact that motorcyclists would also be an easy target for rock-throwers.

That's a Phone Bill!

JERUSALEM — Israel has threatened to cut telephone service to the Gaza Strip if the Palestinian Authority (PA) does not settle its debt to the phone company

The state-owned Bezek company says the PA owes 14 million shekels (about $5 million).

WORLD

China-Iran Deal?

UNITED NATIONS — China ignored U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher's entreaties and insisted last week it would proceed with a nuclear deal with Iran.

The U.S.-China disagreement surfaced at the opening of the United Nations conference on the future of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

China's potential deal with Iran is over two 300-megawatt water reactors and transfer of technology.

"No nation ought to go forward with nuclear cooperation with Iran," Christopher stated. He called Iran the most ardent opponent of peace in the Middle East.

Homosexual Jews Protest

NEW YORK — A group of gay and lesbian Jews has begun a campaign to protest what they believe is discriminatory treatment by the organizers of New York's Salute to Israel Parade.

Members of JAGL: Jewish Activist Gays and Lesbians have gathered 300 signatures on petitions to the American Zionist Youth Foundation, which organizes the largest annual parade in the country honoring the founding of Israel.

Last week, the group inquired about marching in the May 21 event, but was told it was too late to apply. Event organizers say the application deadline was Feb. 1.

The decision is personal. . .

Synagogue affiliation, plot registration and cemetery management in no way limit the freedom to call any particular funeral home, despite reports of misinformation to the contrary. As everyone should know, the decision regarding burial arrangements belongs exclusively and appropriately to the bereaved family, and to no one outside it.

The choice is obvious.

Within the narrow choice there's a clear and indisputable difference. Every senior director at Benjamin's has a wide advantage in years of experience and training. The ability to explain Jewish laws and traditions in depth, the network of professional relationships to count on in unexpected or personal situations and the supervision over sensitive details continuously justify the high regard for Benjamin's as an institution in this community.

By taking their own decisions in hand, and calling upon Benjamin's, families are indicating an uncompromising degree of quality-consciousness for themselves and the memory of a loved one.

Accusations fly at HLI conference

Anti-Semitic charges denied by group's leader

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Far from being apologetic over accusations that his anti-abortion organization, Human Life International (HLI), is anti-Semitic, its president, Father Matthew Habiger, challenged Jews to live up to the values of their religion and join his campaign against "the culture of death."

At a recent press conference here during the Maryland-based HLI 14th World Conference on Live, Life and the Family, Father Habiger said it is a "terrible mistake for anyone to call us anti-Semitic or racist ... We are culture-indifferent and culture blind. We enlist all those who appreciate the value of life."

He singled out B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) national vice-president Stephen Scheinberg, who had compared HLI's charge that Jews are disproportionately represented among abortionists and in the pro-choice leadership to the "blood libel" of the Middle Ages.

"Mr. Scheinberg and BB champion human rights. HLI protects unborn Jewish babies. I ask, when will you begin to do so also?" Father Habiger challenged.

He pointed to the support HLI has received, in particular, from Orthodox Jews, some of whom he claims share HLI's fundamentalist Roman Catholic views on this matter.

Among the participants in the conference were Rabbi Yehuda Levin, a radio talk show host in New York; and Dr. Bernard Nathanson, also of New York, a physician who used to perform abortions but now opposes them.

HLI came prepared to handle its critics charges of anti-Semitism. A "position paper" given to the media blames BBC and the "liberal Canadian media" for spreading that accusation.

BBC's main evidence of anti-Semitism is a 1987 article by HLI founder Father Paul Marx, entitled Pro-Abortion Jews and the New Holocaust, in which he writes: "The same segment of the Jewish community that accuses the Pope of insensitivity to the Jewish Holocaust not only condones, but has more or less led the greatest Holocaust of all time, the war on unborn babies."

The position paper counters: "HLI's detractors conveniently leave out the part where Father Marx writes that Jewish supporters of abortion 'are disloyal to the teachings of Judaism.' [Father Marx] criticizes pro-abortion Catholics much more often and in the same spirit, because these individuals are betraying the moral tenets of their respective faiths."

The paper quotes Father Marx as urging Jews to form specifically Jewish pro-life organizations "to take back the leadership of the Jewish community from the pro-abortionists. By doing so, you will not only help save millions of non-Jewish babies, you may well help save the Jewish nation from the truly 'final solution' of abortion."

At the press conference, Scheinberg demanded that HLI drop all references to the religion, ethnicity or race of "those you brand as murderers."

Holding up a piece of matzah Scheinberg said, "Once again — during Passover — the hideous accusation of ritual murder, that Jews are responsible for the killing of Christian babies, has new life in the trinity of evil of Jewish doctors, Jewish feminists and Jews in the media, according to HLI."

Joining Scheinberg and BBC regional League for Human Rights chair Allan Adel, were Father Joseph Sullivan of St. Richard's (Catholic) Church in Cote St. Luc, Concordia University Protestant chaplain Rev. Matti Terho, and Brad Vanderbilt, representing the Unitarian Church.

Father Sullivan emphasized that he appeared as a parish priest, and not on behalf of the Archdiocese, and would not comment on what his superiors should do.

While denouncing HLI's leaders for "intolerant" ideas capable of "inciting hatred" against Jews, gays and Muslims, the BBC officials were careful to state that they do not doubt that most HLI members "act in good faith and are devoted to their cause."

BBC did not take part in the demonstration outside Notre Dame Basilica, where HLI held its opening mass. (The closing mass was conducted by Pearce Lacey, auxiliary bishop emeritus of Toronto.)

BBC had originally asked the Catholic Archdiocese not to allow HLI to use the basilica, but Scheinberg said that, following a meeting with Vicar-General Neil Willard, it accepted the Church's position that it could not deny any group of Catholics the right to worship.

"He assured us that the Church's connection with HLI ended when they left the basilica door," Scheinberg said.

Scheinberg accused those Jews who support HLI of being "very conservative or right-wing Americans" who are "covering up for their political allies," or else, "very gullible." In February, HLI published a half-page ad in Montreal newspapers signed by 44 Jews saying BB's charge of anti-Semitism is "too preposterous to be given any credibility."

BBC has no position on abortion, Scheinberg stressed, but he ventured to say that "the overwhelming number of Jews in the United States and Canada accept it, perhaps reluctantly."

Abella winds down term as president of Congress

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — With his Canadian Jewish Congress presidency over in May, Irving Abella says goodbye to one of his two full-time jobs — the other being a professor of Canadian history at York University.

"I've enjoyed the job more than I should have," he said. "The Jewish community in Canada is a complex and fascinating one, even more complex than I suspected."

A keen student of Canadian affairs, Abella loved that part of his job that took him into every major Jewish community from the Atlantic to the Pacific. "Every region thinks that they are the most important and of course they're right," he remarked.

In Kelowna, B.C., in the Okanagan Valley, one Friday night, the first appearance of a CJC president there, 200 people greeted him, some from Salmon Arm, Revelstoke, Vernon and Whitehorse. He is unequivocal in his support of a policy to enable small Jewish communities to survive.

"It used to be that there was always a Jew at every stop the train made on the way from Halifax across Canada," he said.

Congress has emerged as a major player in debates on social policy in Canada as a result of the effort it made on behalf of the Yes vote in the Constitution debate. "We lost that vote but we gained credibility as the leading spokesperson for the ethnic communities, the non-governmental organizations and human rights groups."

Abella is proud of Congress' role in getting the International Red Cross to consider giving official status to Magen David Adom in Israel, a conflict of 30 years standing.

Irving Abella

Congress took action for the first time in having a student as one of its 20 officers and as a member of every one of its committees. "We've been neglectful of youth," Abella said. "The universities are the great wasteland. This is where we lose our kids. We are concentrating more of our energies on the universities and this is a fundamental change."

The Canadian Jewish community is the fastest growing in the Diaspora, he points out. "We're the fourth largest. We've passed Britain and we're catching up to Russia. What would make me happy is if we could be as secure and inspiring in the 21st century in Canada as we are in leaving the 20th."

Abella was heavily involved in the tour that took 20 Canadian university presidents to Israel, where they met their counterparts and inaugurated some joint research projects, also becoming involved in Jewish Studies programs in their own universities.

"Intolerance is the world's biggest growth industry and the insensitivity and intolerance to immigrants in this country has surprised me and it shouldn't have, considering the research I have done on immigration as a historian," Abella said.

While hoping it's part of a cycle, Abella notes that anti-immigrant feeling is worldwide, caused by economic difficulties and unemployment, with every country feeling under attack by a surge of potential immigrants. Congress is busy on a day-to-day level with other ethnic groups in countering this anti-immigrant wave, he noted.

A tour of Israel by university presidents had never been undertaken by any other country, he said, and he is gratified that his own status in academe helped to recruit the Canadians who participated. "When they got back to Canada, the presidents spoke out publicly on behalf of Israel's cause," he said.

One highlight of his CJC years was the meeting of the executive of the CJC in Israel when Congress officers met with ambassadors of Egypt and Jordan.

On the community relations front, he is most proud of Congress' coalition with the Sikh community in opposition to the Canadian Legion policy in banning turbans.

The Congress delegation was the largest at the 50th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, outnumbering even that of Israel, and included survivors with their children and grandchildren.

"This was the most inspiring moment of my presidency," he said. "It was an important message we gave to the world: The attempt to wipe out the Jews had failed."

For the first time, Congress arranged for the Jewish War Veterans to hold a ceremony at the National War Memorial in Ottawa commemorating D-Day.

Vancouver's mayor joins conference in Jerusalem

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The greater autonomy given to Israel's mayors and municipal councils made a deep impression on Vancouver Mayor Philip Owen, who attended a recent conference of mayors in Jereusalem.

Mayors are held in high esteem in Israel, Owen said in a phone interview with The CJN, and have control over civic financing and taxation for education, housing, social services and other local needs.

"They're treated almost like royalty," he said, in comparison to Canadian mayors.

Owen was the only Canadian invited to this year's annual conference and just the second Canadian mayor to attend. Israel invites about 40 mayors from all over the world to discuss planning, economic development and the environment.

Owen said 39 mayors were present this year, including 10 from the United States and others from Uganda, Sweden, Britain, Germany and South America. The event is hosted by the Israel government.

"We talked from 8 a.m. to 6 p.m.," Owen said. "And after-dinner discussions went on until far into the night. It was very exciting."

Owen said there are similarities between his and Israel's cities. "They're developing residential districts right in the heart of the business area," he said, "the same as we're now doing in Vancouver."

Owen was impressed with the urban landscaping and praised the landscaped barricades on Tel Aviv's major streets, which prevent motorists from making unauthorized left turns and discourage jaywalking.

Owen met with Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, and had dinner with former Jerusalem mayor Teddy Kollek. Kollek will be in Vancouver May 28 for a Yom Yerushalayim celebration being arranged by Canadian Friends of Hebrew University. Owen plans to invite Kollek to a civic event when he is here.

Owen and his wife stayed on in Israel for a few days after the week-long conference ended. They went north to the Galilee region, where Jewish National Fund officials took them to the B.C. Forest, to which many Vancouverites have contributed.

But it was the special treatment he received at Ben-Gurion Airport on his way home that convinced Owen being a mayor in Israel is special. When an airport official learned he was a mayor, Owen and his wife were taken out of a long lineup "and [we were] whisked through security and customs."

Yom Hazikaron ceremony planned

TORONTO — The Jewish community is invited to attend the annual Yom Hazikaron assembly sponsored by the Israeli Consulate, in honor of Israel's fallen soldiers.

It will be held at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue, 55 Yeomans Rd., on May 2, at 7:30 p.m.

Among the speakers will be the congregation's Rabbi Philip Scheim and Israel Consul General Dror Zeigerman.

Memorial candles will be lit and Kaddish recited by relatives of the soldiers. An Order of the Day from Israeli Chief of Staff Gen. Amnon Shahak is to be read and K'El Maleh Rachamin will be chanted by Cantor Yehuda Rotner.

There will be English readings for those in the audience who do not understand Hebrew. The program also includes members of the Israeli youth movement Tsabar and the Ne'Imot choir. The lowering of the Israeli flag will be part of the assembly.

Media advertising advocated to help women acquire gets

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Exposing the names of men who refuse to give their estranged wives a get (a Jewish divorce) through media advertising is one of the tactics the newly restructured Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get is considering when all else fails in particularly stubborn cases.

The coalition, active for several years in Montreal, is now a fully national organization, bringing together nine major Jewish women's groups.

Some 50 representatives of these groups from across Canada met for a recent three-day retreat at Camp B'nai Brith in the Laurentians where they hammered out a common plan of action.

President Evelyn Brook of Montreal said the coalition's main goal is to raise awareness in the Jewish community of the get issue, provide support to agunot and, when necessary, use a little muscle on recalcitrant husbands.

The coalition believes that communal disapprobation and ostracism is the strongest remedy available at this point, given the unlikelihood of any change in Jewish law, Brook said.

"Those who refuse to give a get are abusing Jewish law and in so doing are abusing their wives. The community should let these men know that such behavior is unacceptable," she said.

The coalition will be asking Jewish federations, synagogues and other institutions to deny honors to recalcitrant husbands.

In extreme cases, she said the coalition may publish these men's names either in the Jewish media or circulating them through the synagogues. Through its contact with the International Coalition for Agunah Rights (ICAR), the Canadian network will try to keep tabs on men who have come here from other countries where they abandoned their wives.

Establishing an information telephone line and/or a mailing address in every Jewish community in Canada is a high priority as well. Trained volunteers will provide information and advice to agunot or others with divorce problems. It is also hoped this will enable the coalition to gain a more precise idea of how many agunot (women who cannot remarry within traditional Judaism because of the lack of a get) there are in this country.

Prevention, of course, is better than a cure. The coalition will conduct a letter-writing campaign requesting that all rabbis require engaged couples to draw up a prenuptial agreement on the get before they officiate at their wedding — already standard practice in Montreal.

The coalition also hopes that an annual vigil in solidarity with agunot will be held in every Jewish community on the eve of the Feast of Esther, just before Purim.

Each local chapter of the coalition will be drawing up a list of lawyers considered sympathetic to the issue and knowlegeable about the federal Divorce Act provision that, if invoked, can hold up a civil divorce decree until the get process has been completed.

The members of the coalition are: B'nai Brith Women of Canada, Canadian Hadassah-WIZO, Emunah Women of Canada, Na'amat Canada, National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, the status of women committee of Canadian Jewish Congress, Toronto Jewish Women's Federation, Women's Canadian ORT and Women's FEDERATION CJA (Montreal). In addition, representatives of the Saskatchewan and Atlantic Jewish Councils attended the retreat.

The retreat received funding from the Department of Canadian Heritage, the Jewish Community Foundation of Greater Montreal and a private foundation.

CJC campaign goes into full gear

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJC Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) presidential campaign has started, with candidates Goldie Hershon and Thomas Hecht each receiving the support of prominent community members.

Hershon, a past CJC Quebec regional chair, was first out of the blocks, with the announcement that past president Milton Harris of Toronto and national unity chair Max Bernard of Montreal are co-chairing her campaign.

Hershon is also benefiting from the experience of her husband Sheldon, who was a key organizer for MNA Lawrence Bergman.

In a prepared statement, Harris and Bernard said Hershon can "uphold the traditions" of CJC and has the "sensitivity" needed during "this crucial period" in the history of Canadian Jewry and Canada as a whole.

Hecht, who declared his candidacy in February, unveiled a campaign committee that includes past CJC president Irwin Cotler; retired executive vice-president Alan Rose; Sen. Leo Kolber; Federation CJA president Lester Lazarus; Joe Benarroch, president of the Canadian Sephardic Federation; and former Hadassah-WIZO president Naomi Frankenburg of Vancouver.

There will be a "meet the candidates" session on the first day of the May 14-15 Plenary Assembly where delegates will vote.

Hershon thinks she would make the better president because she has devoted 16 years to CJC working through the ranks from volunteer to national vice-president. She has resigned her position as chair of the Plenary Assembly.

Hecht, currently chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, Quebec region, feels being a relative newcomer to CJC should not be a factor in his suitability.

The Czech-born Hecht proposes to create a "Jewish rainbow coalition" where Jews of "all shades" can feel involved. His campaign theme is Accommodation Instead of Confrontation in Jewish Communal Life.

This is the first race for the CJC presidency in nine years, when Dorothy Reitman won over David Satok.

Three other officer positions are being contested. Montrealers Frank Schlesinger, a lawyer and CJC veteran, and economist Sam Totah, who has been a member of the Communauté Sépharade du Québec, are vying for the secretary's post.

Running for treasurer are chartered accountants Harold Brief of Toronto, current Ontario region treasurer, and Zave Climan, treasurer of Montreal's Congregation Shaar Hashomayim.

Raphael "Robbie" Diamond, a University of Toronto student, and Sheva Medjuck, a sociology professor at Halifax's Mount Saint Vincent University, are the candidates for associate chair of the national executive.

Acclaimed were Renee Switzer Bellas of Vancouver as chair of the national executive and Keith Landy of Toronto as honorary counsel.

Blacks to be honored

TORONTO — International media baron Conrad Black and his wife, Barbara Amiel Black, will be honored by the Jerusalem Foundation at a tribute dinner here May 25.

Black, the owner of the Jerusalem Post, was chosen for the honor because "he is almost a citizen now of Jerusalem," said former Jerusalem mayor and foundation chair Teddy Kollek from his Jerusalem office.

Amiel Black, a columnist for the Toronto Sun and for her husband's London, England Daily Telegraph, "has been closely connected with Jerusalem affairs for many years as a journalist," Kollek said.

The Jerusalem Foundation, founded in 1966 by Kollek just after he won the first of six mayoral terms, funds arts and cultural programs for all the city's residents.

The money raised by the Black tribute dinner, to be held in the 1,000-seat Metro Convention Centre, will go towards one of five projects: the Jerusalem Film Centre; the film wing of a high school for performing arts; the Tower of David Museum; the city's libraries; or a sports centre for the handicapped.

Tickets for the tribute dinner, priced at $275, can be ordered before May 1 by calling 416-484-6132.

Yom Hashoah

Fifty years ago the war in Europe ended. The Nazi camps were "liberated." The people who walked or were carried out of the camps and lived, survived.

Can their eyes roam a starry night-sky without seeing countless lost souls? Can their ears listen to an autumn wind coursing through a forest of trees without hearing the shared secrets of tormented whispers? Can their hearts look into the ocean depths without breaking? Ever since that time, the word "survivor" has taken on a different meaning.

We are their children. In those 50 years, an entire generation has grown to middle life and has even begun to see its own children start families. But if we are in middle life, the survivors, alas, are in later life. Our response to the fact that they survived and to what they survived is now more pressing, more vital than ever.

Some 2½ decades ago, in struggling with this very issue, the issue of an appropriate Jewish response in a post-Holocaust world, Prof. Emil Fackenheim postulated a four-part response:

...first, to survive as Jews, lest the Jewish people perish; second, to remember in our very guts and bones the martyrs of the Holocaust, lest their memory perish; third, we are forbidden to deny or despair of God, however much we may have to contend with Him or with belief in Him, lest Judaism perish; and fourth, we are forbidden to despair of the world, lest we help make it a meaningless place in which everything is permitted."

In a deeply moving and even courageous Perspectives essay Rabbi Mark Dratch also reflects upon the question of Jewish response. He concludes that a "fitting response is a classically Jewish one, that is, to use suffering as a springboard to improve and ennoble our relationship with God and with Israel, with our Jewishness and our humanity."

Like Fackenheim, Rabbi Dratch reminds us, indeed urges us, that the only response to darkness is light; the only response to hatred is decency; the only response to the denial of Jewish life is its renewal, strengthened, enriched and eternal.

In America's Heartland

As of this writing, 78 bodies have been counted and identified; many more lie in body bags, crushed and not identified; but hundreds have not yet been found. Such was the human toll of the Oklahoma City bombing last week.

True to President Bill Clinton's promise to the American people immediately after the carnage, law enforcement agencies have acted quickly and with some success. They have apprehended a key suspect; other possible suspects are in custody. And if reports in the American media are accurate, the agencies appear to be casting a wider net of responsibility for the Oklahoma deaths among a dangerous web of paramilitary groups, which includes racists, supremacists, anti-Semites and skinheads.

These reports, though harrowing, come as no surprise. Experts have long warned that this tangle of twisted extremists is very dangerous. A double knot ties them together: hatred and violence. Indeed it is the same knot which binds all militant extremists who disdain the lives of others whether they are Oklahoma murderers, right-wing Japanese terrorists or members of Islamic Jihad. Their immediate targets are defenceless individuals. And as Oklahoma City proved yet again, even infants are "legitimate" quarry.

Their ultimate targets, however, are the democratic institutions of the societies which they scorn. They cede authority to no one but themselves, to their megalomania and to their weapons. Surely therefore, the time has come for the democracies of the world to join in common cause to untangle this twisted, distorted skein.

At the memorial service held last Sunday, Clinton stated that there was a "...duty to purge ourselves of these dark forces." We commend his sense of duty. And we commend Prime Minister Jean Chretien for echoing the president's sentiments. But they must be taken to the next level, namely, a collaborative plan of action to oppose, isolate, and uproot terrorism in all its forms.

Hate and terror have plunged their deadly dagger into the heartland of America. The American public feels understandably, alarmed, fearful, angry and vulnerable. The editorial in the Baltimore Sun last Thursday captured the mood very succinctly: "If Oklahoma City, then anywhere."

This is the very point which the Jewish people has emphasized for decades.

Likes new secular Haggadah

Regarding the April 6 article "Secular Association Updates Haggadah."

I commend the Secular Jewish Association for updating this year's Haggadah. While it reflects on the biblical story of Exodus from Egypt, it also incorporates other themes of liberation from Jewish history. Included is the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, the birth of the State of Israel, and the oppression of Soviet Jewry.

While as an Orthodox Jew I follow the traditional Haggadah on the seder nights, I also incorporate the remembrance of past Jewish liberations. I applaud the Secular Jewish Association for the effort of giving secular Jews something they can relate to in Jewish history and to be proud of.

Why do terrorists ignore Arafat?

Following the last double terrorist attack in Israel, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin appeared at long last to question PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat's sincerity. It proved to be a fleeting spell of rationality, as shortly afterwards, he, in chorus with his chosen partner, Arafat, repeated the stale, deceiving refrain that terrorists are the enemies of peace.

Just to refresh our memories, the enemies of peace in Lebanon assassinated Bashir Gemael after he signed the peace agreement with Israel, putting an end to it.

Wouldn't it be rational to assume if those "enemies of peace" were bent on breaking the peace process, they would have turned against Arafat at least once?

The reality, however, is that they are in cahoots with Arafat — in spite of their internecine squabbles — and share the same plan, that of the annihilation of Israel. Until now, their tactic has been quite effective and they undoubtedly expect it to be more successful in the future.

The Scheininger nomination

Your article regarding the Liberal nomination of Les Scheininger in the provincial riding of Willowdale (CJN April 6) implied that I withdrew from the campaign as a result of either: (a) the scare tactics used against me during the early part of the nomination; or (b) Scheininger's entrance into the race. Each of those suggestions could not be further from the truth.

I have never believed in succumbing to intimidation, especially in the political process. I was proud to be running as a Jewish candidate and felt disgusted that hate became a tool or strategy in trying to remove me from the nomination race.

My decision to withdraw from the Willowdale nomination was due to personal and business concerns and made quite independent of Scheininger's entrance into the campaign. To be sure, once I made my intentions known, I was asked by senior members of the Liberal Party to endorse Scheininger and support his candidacy.

50 years after the liberation

Democratic people the world over are now commemorating the 50th anniversary of the liberation of the Nazi concentration camps.

When the Red Army liberated the camps of Eastern Europe, they found sick and emaciated victims who in most cases were near death. As the liberators pried open the gates of the barracks, some of the victims thought they were SS storm troopers coming to kill off the survivors. Some collapsed from fear until they learned the truth.

The Nazi rulers of the camps, fearing the arrival of the Allied liberators, decided to abandon the camps and run towards the West. But in their final acts of desperation, they gathered the surviving victims and marched them over the frozen terrain, for hundreds of miles, towards the still-occupied territories. This was the beginning of the horrible death marches, during which hundreds perished, and many more were shot by the Nazis.

The Allied armies, under General Eisenhower, liberated the camps in the territories located farther west, such as Dachau, Buchenwald, Mathausen, Bergen-Belsen and others. When Eisenhower visited one of the camps and saw the kilometre-long ditches, filled with broken skeletons of murdered men, women and children, he exclaimed in horror: "Could this have happened in the heart of civilized Europe?"

There is no doubt the Jewish people were the main victims of the mad theory of racist superiority, losing six million men and women, including 1.5 million children. This horrible crime, with no equal in the entire history of mankind, was exposed in its full ugliness at the trials in Nurenberg. It led to the liquidation of one-third of an entire nation.

The Nazi hierarchy was united around the decision, taken at the Wansee Conference on Jan. 20, 1942, to liquidate the Jewish people of Europe.

Humanity will stand ashamed for generations that it could produce such wild animals as the Nazi hangmen. Christian civilization and European society will bear the shame for the fact that in the heart of Europe was born and grew such a gruesome and murderous regime.

It took a river of our people's blood for Pope John XXIII to create a new prayer, the one beginning "God, forgive us for the lies, hatred and curses that we directed against the Jewish people."

YOM HASHOAH

Remembrance of things past

By RABBI MARK DRATCH

I begin with a confession: I am a fourth generation American. I have no close relatives who were killed during the Shoah. I have no childhood friends who are children of survivors. In the shul where I was raised, there were only a few survivors, to whom it was difficult to relate. I perceived them as somehow distant, strange and exotic.

The exception was Mr. Klein, the old shammas, whom I would visit on Shabbat afternoons to study a bit of Talmud. From him I heard stories of his experiences with the Nazis and in the camps. And so I was aware of the Shoah, I attended memorial gatherings and marches, I read books and saw films; but I was an outsider to the pain, the anguish and the suffering. The experiences belonged to others.

Over the years, through personal and intellectual experiences, through a matured relationship with the Jewish community, and, most important, through personal friendships and associations with many survivors and their families, the Shoah has become mine as well.

As more years go by, however, fewer and fewer people will be able to have these personal encounters and more and more people will be distanced by time and geography from the ovens of Auschwitz. The heat of the scorching flames of the crematoria will be cooled and the chill of the biting winters in concentration camps will be tempered. The oceans of tears will dry and the echoes of cries will fade. More and more people will know fewer and fewer survivors. As the Shoah becomes less an immediate, personal experience and more a distant, historical account, how will we ensure the survival of its memory?

Many of us look to the survivors for direction. We think that, somehow, their suffering endowed them with unique insight and profound understanding. Yet, many survivors cannot come to terms with their own ordeals and many still hesitate to talk about their experiences. Even 50 years after liberation their wounds are raw and their nightmares terrifying. Although physically liberated, many remain emotionally, psychologically and spiritually imprisoned.

Survivors seek closure for themselves and their loved ones. They trek through life carrying their dead in their arms looking for a way and a place to give them rest. The backs of their gravestones in our cemeteries bear the names of parents, spouses and children who do not have Jewish matzeivot (tombstones). Monuments are erected in cemeteries and in public places. Kaddish is said. K'El Maleh Rachamims are chanted. And yet those who survived and those whom they survived have no rest. The survivors cannot forget and they cannot allow others to forget. Their memories and their stories dare not be buried, they must remain forever alive.

And the survivors' responses are not monolithic. Some lost God in the trains to Auschwitz, others walked with Him as they entered the crematoria. Some abandoned their faith, others left great legacies of spiritual heroism as they observed Passover and Yom Kippur and other rituals in the ghettos and the camps, often at great peril to their lives. Some abandoned their Jewishness after the war, others intensified it. To whom do we turn for "the" answer?

Because I feel that I am an outsider, I hesitate. I confess that I am uncomfortable speaking about the Shoah from the pulpit.

Shortly after liberation, pondering the future. [Gerhard Schoenberner, The Yellow Star]

I feel inadequate to preach to survivors. What can I, a young man who grew up in the freedom and security of late 20th century North America, add to their understanding? How can I help others understand or even relate to this event? Yet, as a rabbi and as a Jew I must respond. I do so with humility.

Peoples' theological responses to the Shoah are diverse. Some, feeling forsaken by God, abandon Him; others seek to justify Him. Although I believe in a good and just God and in the ultimate sense of the universe, I refuse to suggest a theodicy. I consider many of the attempts to explain the Holocaust to be feeble or platitudinous and think that the assorted stabs at pointing the finger of blame and specifying sins which others (and not their accusers) have committed to be callous and, at times, scandalous.

Although I am a person of faith, because I make no claim of definitive understanding of my God, I share the anxiety of those who live in a world where, as British poet Matthea Arnold described in Dover Beach, the "sea of faith" is no longer full. For many of us there is "Nor certitude, nor peace, nor help for pain; / And we are here as on a darkling plain / Swept with confused alarms of struggle and flight. / Where ignorant armies clash by night."

Yet my uncertainty does not paralyze me. My own feelings echo the position of my teacher, Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik, of blessed memory, who asserted that it is response, and not explanation, that is the most essential.

Not all responses are appropriate. For too many people, the Shoah has become a secular religion and a stronger bond to their Judaism than Sinai. For too many, the shadows of Auschwitz are stronger than the light of Jerusalem, and death and destruction more powerful than a living, dynamic Judaism. For too many, suffering is hallowed and emphasis is placed on the victimization, persecution, and annihilation of the Jews.

This is unjust, unwise and, ultimately, destructive. The six million were not only victims, they were Jews and human beings, men and women with names, members of families and successes and failures, loves and hates, pasts and aborted futures. We too often strip the six million of their history and humanity, and treat them as anonymous victims whose only value is in how they suffered and how they died.

Consider the March of the Living, a two-week tour of Poland and Israel for adolescents and young adults. Although it is a worthwhile educational program which I had the privilege of chaperoning a year ago, it is flawed. Too many of the participants spend too much of the time "luxuriating" in death. It is easy to understand why. The rows of barbed wire and miles of train tracks and piles of shoes and mounds of hair and heaps of ashes are enough to haunt anyone for more than a lifetime.

But the program does not do enough to help these young adults appreciate the richness of Jewish life prior to the onset of the war and the magnitude of the Israeli and Jewish experiences after the war.

But Judaism is more than persecution and suffering. Jews have value for how they lived, not just how they died. Pragmatically, young Jews are not inspired by suffering. They do not long for anti-Semitism and have no masochistic urge to be part of a people who are predestined only for persecution. They will remain identified with our culture, faithful to our people and committed to our faith only if they find purpose and value in their Jewishness. Young people will not remember the six million if they do not identify with something beyond their victimization and if they do not understand why it is essential to perpetuate their memories in the first place.

Perhaps Hans Meyerhoff, in his Time in Literature, best summarized our challenge: "Thus a situation has developed which is quite paradoxical in human terms: The barriers of the past have been pushed back as never before; our knowledge of the history of man and the universe has been enlarged on a scale and to a degree not dreamed of by previous generations. At the same time, the sense of identity and continuity with the past, whether our own or history's, has gradually and steadily declined. Previous generations knew much less about the past than we do, but perhaps felt a much greater sense of identity and continuity with it ..."

While any response seems petty and inconsequential in the shadow of the numbing magnitude and intensity of the anguish of the Shoah, inaction and impotence would be blasphemous. It seems to me that a fitting response is a classically Jewish one, that is, to use suffering as a springboard to improve and ennoble our relationship with God and with Israel, with our Jewishness and our humanity. We have the personal and spiritual resources if only we would tap into them. This is not an insensitive suggestion.

Our capacity to remember the lives of the dead depends on how we choose to live our lives; the endurance of the physical and spiritual strengths of the survivors depends on how we develop our own strengths; and the resurrection of the six million souls from the fires of the crematoria depends on the types of passions we spark in our souls and in the hearts and minds of new generations of Jews. These responses will give meaning to the deaths — and, most importantly, the lives — of the six million. These responses will give purpose to the lives of their decendants and will give those who never knew anyone who personally survived, or even never knew anyone who ever knew anyone who knew someone who survived, reasons to remember.

Our responses to the Shoah may be varied, but to meet the goals of the perpetuation of the Jewish people and the continuation of memory, they must inspire us to reaffirm our Judaism, to cultivate our relationship with God, to invigorate our observance of mitzvot, to intensify our study of Torah and tradition, and to strengthen our bond to the community of humanity, the Jewish people and the State of Israel. Only then will there be a Jewish people that can remember. Only then will there be a Jewish people that wants to remember.

A classically Jewish response.

Fifteen minutes to eight

The Rabbi Gamliel Plaut

During the recent months I have written several columns about materials which I have found while preparing for our move to a new location. In retrospect, nothing received as much comment from my readers than the Rules of Life laid down by my late mother and my late mother-in-law. Wherever I have met people, they tell me how much the thoughts of these two women meant to them. Many had cut out the articles, and several asked me for replacement copies. By a strange coincidence these two women — who would be very much surprised that even after they passed on, they continue to make an impression upon the world — were born on April 1 and April 2, respectively, albeit in different years.

I have also shared with you a number of envelopes that were insufficiently addressed but reached me nonetheless because somebody in the post office really cared. Lest I give you the impression that this kind of thing could happen only in days long gone, take a look at an envelope which was dated 1963. Mailed from Wingham, Ont., it was addressed as follows:

The Rabbi X, 15 minutes to 8 a.m., Station CBL, Toronto.

The post office took pains in calling radio station CBL and inquired whether a rabbi had appeared in one of its morning programs. In consequence, the office addressed the letter to me, for whom it was meant.

I don't remember whether I responded to the post office at the time, but even now, after more than 30 years, I bow in respect to its persistence and true work ethic.

More Rules for Life

I was sent the following, which apparently is in the public domain and which I am glad to share with you:

If I Had My Life To Live Over

I'd dare to make more mistakes next time. I'd relax, I would limber up. I would be sillier than I have been this trip. I would take fewer things seriously. I would take more chances. I would climb more mountains and swim more rivers. I would perhaps have more actual troubles, but I'd have fewer imaginary ones.

You see, I'm one of those people who lives sensibly and sanely hour after hour, day after day. Oh, I've had my moments, and if I had it to do over again, I'd have more of them. In fact, I'd try to have nothing else. Just moments, one after another, instead of living so many years ahead of each day. I've been one of those persons who never goes anywhere without a thermometer, a hot water bottle, a raincoat and a parachute. If I had to do it again, I would travel lighter.

If I had my life to live over, I would start barefoot earlier in the spring and stay that way into the fall. I would go to more dances. I would ride more merry-go-rounds. I would pick more daisies.

I don't know whether the writer ever read the biblical book of Koheleth (Ecclesiates). She might be pleased to find this verse (9:10): "Whatever it is be your power to do, do it with all your might."

The honor of legions

Jean M. Gerber

In December 1964, three years before the Six Day War, I stood on top of the Damascus gate while my guide tried to explain the art of warfare that had fashioned the present ramparts, built by the Turks in the 16th century. I looked out through slits meant for archers to rain arrows down on invading forces below.

But battles over Jerusalem took other routes. The beautiful but menacing Damascus gate was never used. Today's Old City east of the Damascus gate is built in the area through which the Crusaders broke in 1099 to slaughter Jews, Muslims and Christians (the European knights could not tell the difference, so they killed them all). Israel's army also entered from the eastern Lion's Gate.

As I stood looking across the road to the East Jerusalem bus station and west to Israeli Jerusalem, it was hard to keep from betraying the distress I felt at the divided city. On cue a detachment of the Jordanian Legion marched past, spiffy in their uniforms. The last in many armies to march around the walls of the city, I thought.

Jerusalem was at the end of the road as far as Jordan was concerned; few tourists roamed its streets, even fewer walked the streets of Bethlehem on Christmas Eve when I arrived at the Church of the Nativity. I believed then that the legion had won. But I was wrong.

When I next visited Jerusalem it was 1971. The buildings in the Jewish quarter that in 1964 had housed squatter families and were crowned with television antennas were being rebuilt. Jews and Arabs mingled in the streets of the old and new city. Hope was in the air that coexistence could be achieved.

Nature of Jewish survival

By Arnold Ages

The same week that I read George Jonas' thought-provoking article about the nature of Jewish survival in Saturday Night magazine, I saw a unique brand of Jewish survival in the Brooklyn neighborhood of Williamsburg.

Reading Jonas' article after experiencing the time warp of visiting the chassidic Jewish enclave there (think of Roman Visnniac's photographs of pious Polish Jews circa 1938) caused mild culture shock to one's religious gyroscope.

Jonas is one of Canada's most gifted journalists. His book Vengeance, the tale of Israel's pursuit of the 1972 Munich Olympic terrorists, and his regular columns in the Toronto Sun show him to be a skillful wordsmith, a serious thinker and an astute social critic. Anything that Jonas writes commands attention.

In his essay he deals with the dilemma faced by people like him, an ethnic Jew who identifies in a tenuous way with his people as a result of an accident of birth. Jonas' parents converted to Christianity in Hungary before World War II but the Jewish quotient in his being stems from his Holocaust experience.

In his musings over his past, Jonas mentions a beloved grandfather whose Jewishness expressed itself in a kind of idolization of 17th-century Dutch philosopher Baruch Spinoza. In this age, however, Jonas finds it impossible to relate to the kind of esoteric Jewish secularism which Spinoza's writings promoted.

As for Orthodoxy, well, unsurprisingly, Jonas cannot identify with this expression of Judaism and I suspect his feelings would be more or less the same towards any of the other interpretations of Judaism which one encounters in today's world.

The Chassidim of Williamsburg have fashioned a fortress of Jewish faith in their enclave, which runs off Lee Avenue just over the Williamsburg Bridge in Brooklyn.

That faith is an uncompromising Orthodoxy which accepts no concession to modernity in theology, language or garb. Virtually every man I saw on Lee Avenue during my visit wore the traditional black hat, long black coat and lengthy payes. Men and women spoke a rich Yiddish only occasionally betrayed by an Americanism. There were children everywhere, all bright-eyed, boisterous and fluent in Yiddish.

While the Chassidim in general repudiate modernity, some among them do not hesitate to use rather trendy techniques to get a message across.

A case in point. The Satmar Chassidim, the most strident of the anti-Israel factions in the area, are well represented in Williamsburg. Members of this group had plastered every available wall space, road surface and storefront with grafitti and posters denouncing the Israel Archaeological Authority and its head, Amir Drori, for permitting digs on the site of the burial grounds of famous rabbinic figures. The protesters called upon all Jews to join them in a public demonstration in front of the Israeli consulate in Manhattan.

The Williamsburg phenomena shows it is possible to secure a form of Jewish survival by surrounding Jews with a hermetically sealed cultural dome in which almost all needs — religious, gastronomic, ritual, educational and social — are tended to within the community structure. The chassidic self-containment principle which discourages contact with the world outside of Williamsburg is successful in giving its constituents the strongest bonding element known in the human collective, a sense of belonging.

However, between the sincere and honest alienation of Jonas and the equally honest sequestered commitment to tradition of the chassidic Jews of Williamsburg, there is a middle path on which Jews may travel. One can admire the integrity of Jonas and the vital religiosity of the Williamsburg Chassidim without sharing their respective views of the world. Most Jews see no conflict in affirming simultaneously their link with the Jewish heritage and with modernity in its most positive expressions.

City of peace

In 1974 when I lived again in the city of peace, whole families rose at Yom Kippur to recite kaddish for their fallen sons, husbands, fathers. It was a sombre year marked by terror.

But 1981 was not much better: shellings, bombs, a feeling that war was inevitable. In 1991 our daughter sat in her kibbutz's sealed room wearing a gas mask. Our spirits spiraled downward — was there to be no end?

There may be.

Thirty years ago there were barricades and bullets. Twenty years ago there were widows and ophans saying kaddish. Ten years ago there were detachments of soldiers returning from Lebanon.

In 1995 we cannot say we are marching towards total peace. Yet Jerusalem bustles with armies of tourists, while Jordan's prince visits Israel's capital to talk business. For all its imperfections and the heart-wrenching terrorist attacks which seek to destroy it, peace seems possible.

Peace will be less disciplined than the legions; it is blood stained by the death of its victims. But the legions of those who see it coming are more honorable than the armies that seek to destroy it.

Think about this on Yom Hazikaron and Yom Ha'atzmaut. Chag Somayach.

World War II

Soldiers coming by the troops,
In their tanks and in their boots.

They go marching through the town,
While people are looking with a frown.

They shoot people without a care,
And others do not think it's fair.

People are lying on the ground,
Dead and silent, without a sound.

Nazis shot the Jews they saw,
While people looked at them in awe.

People hid Jews in their closet rooms,
Along with all the dust and brooms.

When Nazis came into a house,
The Jews were quiet, like a mouse.

If they were found they were shot to death,
And taken away, so nothing was left.

As Hitler's army was killing Jews,
He burned them, to leave no clues.

He sent Jews to concentration camps,
And at night he left them, with no lamps.

After six years of losing faith,
Armies came and opened the gate.

Hitler took his life away,
That was the price he had to pay.

A generic portrait of survivors

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Fifty years after the end of World War II, the Holocaust still weighs heavily on survivors.

To them, the war was not merely a series of battles, some more decisive than others, but the apotheosis of centuries of anti-Semitism.

In the terrible whirlwind sowed by the Nazis and their all too willing collaborators, they plumbed the deepest depths of human hatred, contempt and depravity.

Much has been written about the Holocaust — memoirs, historic narratives and novels. But far less has been produced about its psychological impact on the survivors.

In this field, two works stand out. The first is William Niederland's Psychiatric Disorders Among Persecution Victims: A Contribution to the Understanding of the Concentration Camp Pathology and Its Aftereffects, published in 1964. The second is Leo Eitinger's Concentration Camp Survivors in Norway and Israel, released in the same year.

Niederland and Eitinger listed the symptoms usually associated with survivors — chronic anxiety, fear of renewed persecution, depression, recurring nightmares, psychosomatic disorders, anhedonia (an inability to experience pleasure), social withdrawal, fatigue, hypochondria, difficulty in concentrating, irritability, a hostile and mistrustful attitude toward the world and hallucinations.

Their landmark books are generally regarded today as the point of departure for most psychiatric pronouncements about survivors. Building on their research, Aaron Haas — a child of survivors — has written an absorbing book which reinforces our understanding of what Niederland called "survivor syndrome." It is entitled The Aftermath: Living with the Holocaust (Cambridge University Press, $22.95 US).

Written in layman's language and thus widely accessible, The Aftermath is based on extensive reading and, more importantly, interviews with 58 survivors from 11 countries now residing in the United States.

The topics Haas addresses range far and wide, from the survivors' sense of personal vulnerability to their overdependence on offspring. But when all is said and done, one theme crops up again and again — "the elasticity of the limits of endurance, and the human need and capacity to reassert a vigorous life," as Haas puts it.

Haas reminds us that survivors cannot be categorized as a "unitary phenomenon," since their experiences varied. Some lived in ghettos and death camps, others eluded their tormentors by hiding or fighting as partisans, and still others posed as Christians. Not surprisingly, the circumstances of their survival shaped their outlook after the war.

Haas, correctly, observes that their post-Holocaust traumas were caused not only by the deaths they witnessed, but by the conditions which demonized and consigned them to second-class citizenship.

In drawing a generic portrait of survivors, the author concludes that the "most discomfited" are those whose children were murdered or died of disease while in their care. They are tormented by their failure to prevent their child's untimely death and by their inconsolable loss.

And yet there are survivors who are unable to mourn until they reach old age. Invariably, these kind of survivors lost a multitude of immediate family members and relatives. Haas elaborates: "When we lose a loved one, we lose a part of ourselves. When so much of the self is removed at once, a disorientation ensues, an emotional paralysis follows."

For some survivors, the "emotional numbing" they forced upon themselves as a survival tactic lingers on, further impeding their ability to grieve, writes Haas.

A striking characteristic of survivors is their abiding feeling of vulnerability and their expectation of future danger. For most survivors, human beings are inherently selfish and murderously aggressive. Believing that Jews are under constant siege, many survivors have no contacts with non-Jews and restrict their focus to the Jewish world.

Yet survivors who owe their survival to gentiles are less bitter, pessimistic and condemning, we're told.

The greatest proportion of survivors were beset by nightmares most frequently immediately after their liberation. As they rebuilt their shattered lives, accepting new responsibilities and pressures, sleep-induced memories of the past tended to recede into the background, he notes.

Interestingly enough, many survivors shun books and movies about that era. So it's not surprising that the majority know little about the Third Reich or its anti-Jewish program, and that some survivors are only acquainted with the persecution of Jews in their own country.

According to his data, 80 per cent of survivors chose a fellow survivor as a wife or husband. Often, relationships developed between survivors from the same city or area. In such unions, pre-war social class barriers evaporated and religious-secular distinctions disappeared. Only a few intermarried.

Approximately 11 per cent of survivors are divorced, compared to 18 per cent of American-born Jews. Citing the findings of sociologist William Helmreich, Haas attributes the low divorce rate to the survivors' values and fears. Marriage is not dependent on romance, and is considered a partnership for life. Then there are survivors who are too frightened, or weakened, to begin anew.

But statistics can be misleading. Since many of these post-war marriages were entered into on the basis of circumstance and convenience, marital discord inevitably set in.

Realizing early on that they had not selected a mate out of passion or love, many survivors, particularly females, looked to their children for emotional gratification.

And because survivors were traumatized by the sudden loss of loved ones, they are unusually anxious about their children's welfare, and overly dependent on them. As a corollary, their offspring tend to feel guilt or ambivalence in cases of youthful rebellion and separation.

It comes as no surprise that survivors are exceedingly sensitive about intermarriage. In their eyes, it represents "the purposeful eradication of the Jewish people." But what about instances where one of the spouses converts to Judaism? Haas doesn't bother to examine this question.

Neither is it surprising that survivors feel a special kinship with Israel, as surveys confirm. Although they constitute less than two percent of the Jewish population in the United States, they have bought 10 percent of Israel Bonds in the U.S. And they visit Israel much more often than native-born Jews, and are angered by Jews who criticize Israel publicly.

Finding a meaningful purpose in life has alleviated the post-war guilt of survivors. "For many, replenishing their family and the Jewish people served as justification for having beaten the odds," Haas says.

Despite their broken hearts, survivors believe they lead normal lives. And because they prefer to look forward rather than backward, few have sought out psychiatric assistance.

Haas contends that survivors have displayed remarkable "adaptive capacities." After immigrating to the United States, they attained middle-class status rather quickly.

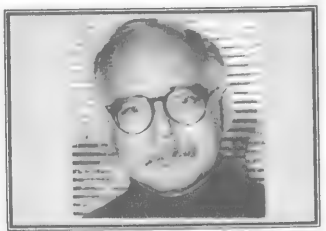
Having overcome incredible adversity and deprivation, survivors are imbued with a confidence in their ability to surmount any and all challenges.

After liberation, about 25 per cent of Jewish survivors resettled in the United States, the locus of The Aftermath. The remainder went to Israel (55 per cent), Europe (roughly 10 per cent) and Canada, Australia, South Africa and Argentina (10 per cent).

Israel, Haas states, gave survivors an opportunity to develop a positive self-image as pioneers building a homeland and a refuge for Jews.

However, survivors faced problems in Israel. The constant tension generated by Israel's military conflict with its Arab neighbors underlined the precariousness of Jewish existence. And Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion's flippant description of them as "demoralizing material" doubtless disheartened survivors. One wonders how he could have been so insensitive.

Holocaust survivors in New York City attend a ceremony marking the arrival of the first survivors in the United States soon after World War II.



Jewish World

The infamy of the camps

During my travels abroad, I have visited several of the major German concentration camps in Poland, Germany and Austria. I have seen the silent barracks, the barbed wire fences, the ruins of crematoria.

And I have spoken with my parents, who lost their youth and their innocence in camps like Auschwitz and Gross Rosen.

But for all the knowledge I possess about this ugly and still unbelievable chapter in the affairs of mankind, I was not really prepared for Memory of the Camps, a gut-wrenching documentary recently broadcast on the CBC TV network.

I am not an emotional person, but the graphic pictures which flickered across the screen shook me. The sight of those sullied, broken, naked corpses, piled like cordwood in a succession of camps, had its effect.

I have seen numerous documentaries about Nazi atrocities. But none seemed as starkly powerful or as gripping as this one.

Memory of the Camps was made in 1945 by camera crews attached to Allied armies which liberated these unspeakable places. The film, which was never completed, was supposed to have been given wide circulation. But British and American censors blocked its release, fearing it was too strong for public tastes. For 40 years, it gathered dust, finally being broadcast on PBS in 1985, a screening I missed.

The film opens with views of the bucolic countryside around Bergen Belsen, then swoops down for an unhurried look at the camp. It is a deliberate conceit, designed to juxtapose the pastoral beauty of the land with the sickening desolation of the camp.

The camera is unflinching. Survivors move on rickety, skeletal legs. Rotting corpses are unceremoniously dumped into pits by former SS guards, the spectacle watched by local German officials invited to witness what crimes their leaders perpetrated. Lice-infested inmates are washed, scrubbed and deloused. Children, the few who survived this madness, are fed and clothed.

The narrator, actor Trevor Howard, describes the proceedings in a low, deeply-ironic voice. The tone is in keeping with the mood of suppressed anger and outrage.

The film moves on to Dachau, where vacant-eyed prisoners huddle under blankets; to Buchenwald, where shrunken heads and lamp shades fashioned out of human skin are exhibited for the edification of shocked British politicians; and then on to Ebensee, Mauthausen, Ludwigslust, Ohrdruf, Gardelegen and Auschwitz, where more horrifying scenes are played out like a diabolical dance of death.

It is a crying shame that Memory of the Camps, the oldest film about the Holocaust, was buried ignominiously for four decades. The world needed to be reminded of the depths to which humans can descend.

Yet the film is not without flaws. It underplays the Jewish tragedy and it relegates Auschwitz to a footnote. Nevertheless, it remains an extraordinary cinematic document.

Rabbinic Reflections

By RABBI HILLEL D. GOLD

The 27th of Nissan. Yom Hashoah v'hagvurah, designed by the Israeli Knesset as the day in which we are to recall the horrors of this century and the brutality which our family, friends, and coreligionists faced at the hands of the Nazis during the Holocaust.

It has now been 50 years since the end of World War II. Two generations have passed since then, yet we must continue to remember the tragedy. In this 50th anniversary year, much is being made of the events leading up to the war's conclusion.

As we commemorate Yom Hashoah this year, we should, and must, utilize the opportunity of its observance to keep alive the memory of the kedoshim who perished and gave their lives al kiddush hashem (in sanctification of God's name); perishing simply because they were Jewish.

In Judaism, we often focus on the concept of the life cycle, and the idea that life is continuous, seemingly without end or beginning. This affords us the opportunity to keep our emotions "in check," allowing us occasions to celebrate and also opportunities to mourn and remember, while always keeping in mind that something else is never too far away.

Certainly at this time of the year, we ride an emotional roller coaster, moving from great joy to deep sadness and back again to great joy. The Passover seder reflected this reality, as we prayed for the opportunity to go m'yagon l'simchah, may-ay-vel l'yom tov (from sadness to happiness, from mourning to joy).

We celebrated our freedom last week during Passover, and will celebrate the crowning jewel of 20th century (and beyond) Jewish life, the anniversary of the State of Israel next week. Sandwiched in between is Yom Hashoah. Perhaps its placement is not accidental. Amidst the joy associated with this time of year, we must step back and remember that for too many, there was no joy.

We are morally challenged to be mazkir, to remember those who perished, and equally as important, those who suffered and survived. Through the many observances that will be held in our community in commemoration of Yom Hashoah, our participation is our tangible way of showing the survivors, and the entire world, that we will never forget this period in our lives.

Yes, we look forward, we eagerly anticipate the joyful celebrations which our calendar brings us. But we also have the duty and responsibility to remember and recall. This should be the underlying message for the placement of Yom Hashoah in such close proximity to Pesah and Yom Ha'atzmaut.

For the sake of the six million kedoshim, the martyrs who perished in Europe, and for the sake of those who lived through that period, may we each take time out on the 27th of Nisan to recall the tragedy of the Holocaust, and vow that we will do what ever it takes, both on a personal and a communal level to insure that no such tragedy ever again strikes the Jewish community.

Within many of our congregations of the Conservative Movement, this pledge is being carried out in a tangible way through the Yellow Candle Project. On Yom Hashoah a "yahrzeit-type" yellow candle is placed in the window to publicly recall the day and ensure it never happens again. The project is to be commended, and should be implemented in as wide a fashion as possible.

May the world know that we will always recall on this day what took place 50 years ago, and may our actions of today cause the memory of the righteous who perished then to live on in our hearts and minds.

50 Years Ago

By MICHAEL ROSEN
Special to The CJN

I am dying.

I lie here on a bunk at Dachau Concentration Camp. This, after suffering through Birkenau and Mathausen death camps.

Liberation is so close.

Oh, God Almighty. Help me. I don't want to die. Spare me so that I may be able to tell the horrors of this hell in Nazi Germany.

I am shivering. I fear I have gone blind. It's so dark. Where am I? My mind scrambles to remember something. I see a huge pit filled with people. My loving parents, my beautiful sister Golda, holding her beloved daughter Ruthie. I wanted to reach them ... to touch them ... keep them close to me forever — but sadly, they fade away.

I hear crying and moaning. These noises rise to screams. It is the Russian prisoner who lies in the bunk above me. He spends his days and nights screaming and talking to himself.

My head is so hot. My mouth dry. This is typhus. We were isolated from the other inmates. I don't remember how long I have been lying here. I gesture with my hand for a drink from those passing by, but no one pays attention. I am invisible. I try desperately to pick myself up. It is impossible. I fall back. I am so weak. The German medical staff had already run away knowing that at any time the American army would come.

Liberation is so close.

I feel better today. No more sweating. I was able to keep my eyes open. The man who gave me a pill was a medical doctor from France. An inmate like me. In accented German, he asked if I felt better. I shook my head in response.

Three days later, the infamous Dachau Concentration Camp was liberated by American soldiers. Thirty-thousand prisoners had their freedom.

It was April 29, 1945.

Tens of thousands of others did not live to see the day.

The American troops wept and vomited as they moved through the naked corpses in shock. Corpses. Corpses piled 10 feet high. The stench of burning bodies. The ravaged faces of the skeletal survivors tormented by hunger and disease.

The survivors were apathetic in the hours after liberation. We were free from the sadistic oppression of Nazi Germany, but where would we go? Who was left? Who were we?

It took months until the American Red Cross was able to nurture my then 80-pound body back to physical health.

Survivor Michael Rosen lives in Toronto.

Jewish Life

A welcome sight

By ROBERT ENGEL

April 12, 1945
Camp Westerbork, Netherlands:

The SS left two days ago and gave us over to a German army parachute unit fighting as infantry in the area. This morning when we came to the gate of the camp, the paratroopers were gone.

GUEST VOICES

Some of us climbed a watchtower and I saw them hopping through the field.

We were ordered by our workboss to empty the camp of the ammunition left behind. As we unloaded one carriage outside the camp, we saw the whole camp, 861 people, storm out.

"They are coming, they are coming" they shouted and pointed.

Franz and I jumped in the carriage and the driver raced towards them. I saw the tanks standing next to a farmhouse. The carriage was too slow for me and I jumped out of the carriage and ran. Franz was next to me, he ran to the first and I to the second tank. (We found out later that these were not tanks but armored cars, "Scoutcars".)

A soldier looked out over the top and I grabbed his hand and all I could say was "Thank you. Thank you." He grinned and said, "It's OK, it's OK."

He looked through his binoculars at the crowd storming towards us. "What's that?," he asked. I didn't know the English word for concentration camp. "It's a Jewish camp," I said. He understood and mumbled something.

After a few minutes he said to his crew, "OK, let's go." The tank started rolling and we drove slowly towards the camp, passing the crowd — screaming, waving, crying and laughing at the same time, a sight I will never forget.

We stopped in front of the dreaded SS camp headquarters. There we hoisted a huge Dutch flag and one made out of the yellow star material. We sang the Dutch national anthem, Her Wilhelmus, and every country's song we knew: God Save the King, Marseillaise, Internationale, Belgium's Brabants Zon, Hatikvah for all the Jews.

All of a sudden these soldiers, our liberators, started singing. We didn't know the song, had never heard it, but we knew instinctively that it was an important song. They sang it with such pride, their dirty faces beaming. That song, O Canada, became for me the most beautiful song in the world. We were free.

To all veterans of World War II, thank you! Thanks to you I can write this.

Robert Engel was incarcerated for 2½ years in Westerbork, the largest concentration/transit camp in the Netherlands, through which 105,000 Jews passed. Westerbork was liberated on April 12, 1945 at 3:30 p.m. by units of the 2nd Canadian Division and the 5th Armored Divison.

Counting the omer

By RACHEL TURKIENICZ

This month we are plunged from celebrating Passover into the period of counting the omer.

Our community is forbidden to celebrate in a public fashion during this time: the laws of omer are reminiscent of mourning observed on the national level.

The second day of Passover begins the count. We have not yet completed celebrating our liberation when we begin the days of sadness that the counting implies.

The omer commemorates a national sadness. The Talmud speak of this period as one of tremendous disaster. Rabbi Akivah was said to have lost thousands of students to a "plague" at that time. The Jerusalem Talmud describes this "plague," which might have been a Roman massacre aimed at eradicating Rabbi Akivah and his followers.

This time stands as a yearly reminder that just as national redemption is part of our history, national disaster is part of our reality. Nothing makes this point more clearly than including the Holocaust Memorial Day in this same time period.

Our sages teach that we model our future redemption on our past redemption. The details of Pesach serve as the precedent upon which we pray for future, and ultimately final, redemption.

Let us consider one of these details. The number four repeats throughout the seder. There are four questions and four cups of wine. One of the many reasons given is to underline the four matriarchs: Sarah, Rebecca, Rachel and Leah, and through them all women.

The rabbis state it was the "merit of the women" that brought liberation. The Bible tells the reader that the midwives refused to murder the infant boys, and Moses' mother and sister succeed in saving him from Pharaoh's decree. It is believed the women kept the teachings and identities of the Hebrew vibrant even in the depths of slavery. These examples, among others, led to our redemption from Egypt. Yet, the targets of Pharaoh's decree were male.

In the talmudic era, the Roman empire attempted to eradicate Judaism. The Jewish leaders targeted were the men. Their students were men, the rebellions were led and fought by men. The women suffered because they were part of the whole. The Holocaust Memorial Day falls into this same time period, but it does not follow the parallel.

The Holocaust was a modern Egypt, a modern Rome, taken to diabolical extremes. It was not men who were targeted, but every Jew. The culture attacked included male teachers of Jewish law, and female teachers of the Jewish home. Every camp housed men and women, boys and girls. Every rebellion included male and female leaders. We all stood together to equally perish and equally survive.

If the women were the redeeming force in Egypt, we were all redeeming forces in the Holocaust. We count the omer together, we remember the Holocaust together, and we await our final redemption together, men and women alike.

HUNGER

"Mommy, mommy please give me a little piece of bread.
I am hungry, very hungry! Just this little mommy!"
My two-year-old son put his two tiny fingers together
Showing just how little he wanted.
"Tomorrow, my son, tomorrow maybe the war will be over
And you will have all the bread you want.
Hush, hush little one, go to sleep, don't cry
Mommy will hold you my darling and sing you a lullaby."
The next day comes and goes, but no food, only hopes.
Hopes that tomorrow we could be free.
The following morning indeed, we hear some noises, different voices.
We all rush to the courtyard and there he is —
A Russian soldier who just liberated us!
I beg him with sign language with tears running on my cheeks,
Please give me some bread, my baby is starving to death.
The soldier reaches into his pocket and puts a roll in my hand.
As I give it to my child he looks at it with wide unbelieving eyes.
Then crying and laughing and jumping with joy
He bites into the soft, beautiful white roll. —

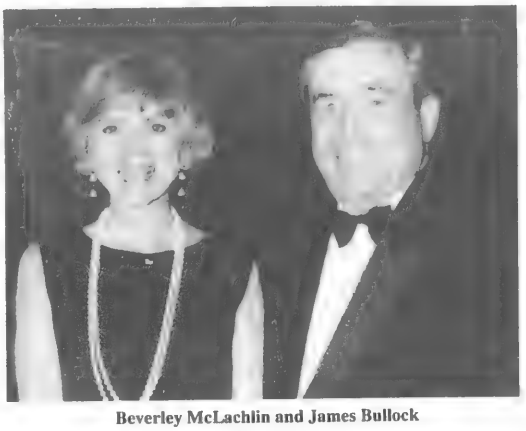
Judge says Canada, Israel can learn from each other

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter



Beverley McLachlin and James Bullock

TORONTO — Canada and Israel share a common challenge: to find a way for people of diverse backgrounds and beliefs to live together, according to a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Justice Beverley McLachlin was keynote speaker at the recent Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University tribute dinner honoring Toronto businessman James Bullock, president and CEO of Laidlaw Inc.

Six hundred people gathered at the Inn on the Park Hotel to fete Bullock and mark the establishment of the university's James R. Bullock Chair in Canadian Studies.

McLachlin, who participated in the first Canadian-Israeli conference on human rights hosted by the Canada-Israel Legal Cooperation Program at the university in 1992, said the two countries can learn much from each other. She noted that Israeli and Canadian judges read and quote from each other's legal judgments.

Israel, like Canada, is a democracy and a multicultural, multi-ethnic society, McLachlin said. Both countries recognize the dignity of each individual through human rights law, she emphasized.

To illustrate the commitment of Israeli lawyers to human rights law, McLachlin noted that at 5 a.m. on the day of her arrival in Israel, Israeli lawyers were fighting in court against the deportation of 415 Palestinians.

"Notwithstanding the constant danger and insecurity ... notwithstanding ancient enmities, these lawyers were fighting to uphold the civil liberties and freedoms of those whom many in their society, including the government, saw as threats to those very freedoms."

The law is important in maintaining peace in Israel, McLachlin noted.

She praised the Israeli high court for its handling of judicial issues in the territories. Although the area is under military rule, and Israeli law per se does not apply there, inhabitants can take their grievances to Israel's high court, she said.

"Recognizing claims from the occupied territories as justiciable was neither necessary nor obvious. In fact, I was told there was no precedent ... but over the years [the court] found a way ... While the court cannot review political or military policy, it can review the manner in which it is exercised," she said.

The Israeli high court's handling of a recent case involving benefits for the same-sex partner of an El Al employee was also a reflection of "the vigilance of the high court in Israel in the protection of human rights," McLachlin said.

She praised the establishment of the new chair in Canadian Studies as an opportunity to "learn through sustained academic endeavor."

In his address, Bullock also referred to the importance of education. "With the international nature of our world today, the pursuit of vitality and fostering of health in our universities and institutions of higher learning has never been more necessary."

Since the Centre for Canadian Studies was established in 1992, it has become "one of the first academic centres in the world on research and education on Canada," said Ralph Halbert, chair of the university's international board of governors. There has been a program in Canadian Studies since 1977.

Other speakers included Arie Shachar, director of the Centre for Canadian Studies; Bob Rae, premier of Ontario; Henry Jackman, lieutenant-governor of Ontario; and Jack Frieberg, president of the Toronto chapter of Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec Synagogue gave the invocation and said Hamotzi, and Hugh Segal, former adviser to then prime minister Brian Mulroney, was emcee for the evening.

TV shapes values towards intermarried: rabbi

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Azriel Fellner's fascination with movies dates back to his childhood, when he had a temper tantrum at the end of the first movie he ever saw, because he didn't want it to end.

The spiritual leader of Temple Beth Shalom in Livingston, N.J., who himself produces films, now uses film and television clips as teaching tools for Jewish audiences.

His unique take on Intermarriage and the Media provoked animated discussion among a mixed audience at Adath Israel Congregation recently. The presentation was sponsored by the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, Ontario region.

Over the past 10 years, television — not the movies — has been dealing with Jewish acculturation in a forthright, confrontational and provocative way, said the rabbi. "We have to understand that what appears on the screen shapes the values of what we believe is true," he emphasized.

Although the clips he used were not the most current (Thirtysomething, Chicken Soup and Brooklyn Bridge are no longer being produced), their ramifications are still evident in today's shows, he said.

Rabbi Azriel Fellner

"Most people who fall in love do not really talk about the fundamental issues that either unite or divide them," said Rabbi Fellner.

Discussion trivialized issues

After playing a scene from Thirtysomething, in which intermarried parents Hope and Michael discuss how to celebrate Christmas and Chanukah, the rabbi asked, "Was it terrible? No. These two people love each other. They have a good relationship."

However, their discussion is on a "trivialized level," he noted. Trivializing the issues is the only way to make them unthreatening, he explained.

To the producers' credit, said Rabbi Fellner, the discussion was not the end of the issue.

"I didn't think I did [believe in G-d], but I think I do," Michael tells his cousin later in the episode after Hope survives a serious car accident and they learn that she's pregnant. "But which G-d? Who G-d? Where G-d?" he asks.

Issues which may not matter now do matter eventually, the rabbi pointed out. "You just don't know it matters until the first child is born or until the first holiday comes. Kids, you have to ask what matters to [you], and what will matter in 10 or 20 years," he advised.

For Monica Ponziano, 26, the Thirtysomething episode hit a personal chord. "I'll be facing those issues," said the intermarried Jewish woman, who is expecting her first child this summer.

"Maybe we had blinders on," she said of the decision she and her husband made to deal with intermarriage issues as they arise. "We're compromising."

In response to another audience member, who felt there have to be answers to intermarriage, Rabbi Fellner said, "Even with the most Orthodox Jewish community who have done everything you might consider right, still they have intermarriage.

"This," he said, pointing to the screen, is part of the problem."

Substance abuse among women blamed on men

TORONTO — A prominent Jewish community therapist says women are often introduced to substance abuse by men.

According to Rochelle Thompson, who works with Jewish Family & Child Service, women whose male partners are abusing drugs or alcohol are more likely to abuse substances themselves.

Men, she said, are not as easily influenced by women, yet they still seek acceptance. "When people use chemicals, they want others to come along ... to validate what they're doing."

Thompson, one of three guest experts at an upcoming forum sponsored by Jewish Women's Federation, said women abuse drugs and alcohol for different reasons than men. "Women are more vulnerable to being over-prescribed by doctors," she said, and are more likely to "numb out" emotional pain through drinking or drug use.

However, unlike men, Thompson said women are generally not pushed into substance abuse through peer pressure from their own sex. "Getting socialized into substance abuse, is a male issue," she said.

There are no reliable statistics on the number of Toronto Jews abusing drugs or alcohol. According to some American estimates, women comprise 30 per cent of those in treatment for substance dependency.

Thompson will be joined at the May 10 forum by Freda Muscovitch and Bonnie Madonik of The Donwood Institute.

Families make pilgrimage to mark liberation

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Robbie Klein isn't the least bit concerned about visiting Theresienstadt and other Nazi concentration camp sites later this month.

"I've got my grandfather with me," the 19-year-old says. "What should I worry about?"

Klein and his brother David, 21, are scheduled to leave this week on something of an odyssey. Together with their grandfather, 77-year-old Morris Henechowicz, they'll travel to Theresienstadt in the Czech Republic to say Kaddish at the grave of Henechowicz's brother, who perished there in 1945 and whose headstone was discovered by the family just five years ago.

After two days in and around Prague, the Klein boys will be joined by their mother Sue — Henechowicz's daughter — for a week-long tour of Poland and its death camp sites.

They'll meet up with about 30 others for the trip, one of several leaving Canada this week to mark the 50th anniversary of the liberation of the camps.

The tours are a popular travel item this year, both for Holocaust survivors seeking a cleansing experience and for the second and third generations wanting a first-hand look, said travel agent Sue Klein of YYZ Travel, which is organizing one of the trips.

For Henechowicz, the tour holds some particular ironies. He'll return not only to his hometown of Piotrokow but also to the site of Majdanek, the death camp he helped liberate as a tank driver in the Polish army.

Asked how he feels about returning, Henechowicz shrugged. "I'm very happy to go with the boys," he said.

The Polish leg of the trip gets underway May 1, when 32 people, including 10 survivors, will arrive in Warsaw and meet with the tiny Jewish community's spiritual leader, Rabbi Michael Schudrick.

Trips are scheduled to the once-thriving Jewish centres of Zwolen, Lodz, Kalish and Kielc.

Death camps on the itinerary will include Auschwitz, Majdanek and Treblinka, but the main thrust of the trip is to see and experience the revival of Jewish life in Poland, Klein said.

Scheduled are visits to Warsaw's Jewish Historical Institute and Jewish State Theatre, and the Remu Synagogue and Ariel Cafe in Kazimierz. Yom Ha'atzmaut will be spent with the small Jewish population in Kazimierz (Dolna).

At week's end, tour participants will have the choice of going to Israel or Prague.

* * *

Some 50 people left Toronto last Sunday for the Canadian Jewish Congress-sponsored Agony and the Pride tour that will take travellers to Poland for four days and Israel for another 10.

The Polish itinerary includes stops at Auschwitz and Majdanek, said Amnon Levmor of Sabra Tours. Yom Ha'Shoah will be spent in Poland.

Inter-generational experience: Morris Henechowicz (standing), his daughter and grandson will travel to the sites of Europe's death camps. [Ron Csillag photo]

Anti-Semitism's impact on women said ignored

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspodent

HAMILTON — The feminist movement does not support Jewish women who have experienced racism, says a feminist and academic now compiling research for a ground-breaking study of sexism and anti-Semitism.

Nora Gold, an associate professor at McMaster University's School of Social Work, believes that while the feminist movement rallies to the cause of Asian women and women of color, Jewish women "are not considered a diverse group.

"The reality of anti-Semitism and oppression was pretty systematically negated," she told The CJN in a recent interview.

Gold, who is co-chair of the status of women sub-committee of Canadian Jewish Congress, said she was "completely horrified" to find "complete silence" in the feminist movement about the impact of anti-Semitism and sexism on Jewish women, and decided to look into the topic.

So, last year the 42-year-old embarked on the first phase of a three-year government funded study, the first of its kind.

After placing ads in several newspapers, including The CJN, Gold found 120 women in Toronto and Montreal — ranging in age from 20 to 62 and in occupation from homemakers to professionals — to take part in lively discussion groups.

Nora Gold

Some talked about not getting jobs because they were Jewish, Gold said, while others talked with "considerable anguish" about the way they were treated when they took time off for Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur.

The women spoke of the fear of not being accepted and about stereotyping. One woman, Gold said, pretended to be a vegetarian rather than admit to adhering to kosher dietary laws.

In the second phase, Gold plans to send a questionnaire to a random sampling of women across Canada, asking specific questions about anti-Semitic experiences.

She hopes to publish her findings in academic journals and in magazines, present them at professional conferences and eventually, write a book.

Born in Montreal, Gold made aliyah following her graduation from McGill University, and after several years in Israel, she returned to Canada to pursue further studies at the University of Toronto.

At McMaster since obtaining her PhD in 1990, Gold lives in Toronto with her husband and young son.

Any women wishing to participate in the study can call Gold at 905-525-9140, ext. 23791

Yom Ha'atzmaut festival expected to draw crowd

TORONTO — Record crowds are expected for this year's Yom Ha'atzmaut festival, to take place in North York's Mel Lastman Square on Sunday, May 7 from 11 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Organizers are busy putting the finishing touches on the day-long bash to mark Israel's 47th birthday, which will feature Israeli music, art, food and crafts and more. Admission is free.

The festival is a project of Canadian Zionist Federation, under the patronage of Israel's consul general, Dror Zeigerman. Cooperating groups are B'nai Brith Canada, Canadian Jewish Congress, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, Na'amat Toronto and Toronto Women's ORT.

The Tree Top Kids are slated to perform at noon. Other attractions for children will include pony rides, face painting and clowns.

The official opening is scheduled for 1 p.m. Among the expected guests are Ontario Premier Bob Rae, Zeigerman, and North York Mayor Mel Lastman.

There will be a special presentation by Toronto Jewish youth groups immediately after the opening.

At 3 p.m., performances by Zimriah — the choirs of Bialik Hebrew Day School, Leo Baeck School and Temple Sinai School — will take place. These will be followed by a performance from Rikudiyah, the Jerusalem Dancers.

A silent auction, craft and product marketplace, and Israeli quiz are also scheduled. A photographic tour of Israel will be offered by the Association of Israelis of Greater Toronto.

Art by children will complement a display by members of the Israeli Artists Group, established three years ago to showcase the work of Israeli artists who have immigrated to Canada.

Among the group of 24 is painter Dubi Arie, whose monumental work, The Mission, is currently on display in Columbus, Ohio. A segment of the mural has been reproduced and a limited quantity of signed, numbered posters will be for sale.

Israeli food and delectables (all kosher) will be available.

Following the day's festivities, a concert of contemporary music will be held in the council chambers of North York City Hall. Featured will be Cantor Benjamin Maissner, Cantor Efraim Sapir, Israeli-born chanteuse Ahuva, the Lachan Choir and the Ne'imot Singers. For tickets, call 416-633-3988.

Yaffa Eliach has preserved the history of her Lithuanian hometown in the Tower of Faces photographic exhibit at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum.

Eliach's photos capture life before the war

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The voice on the phone is refined, with a trace of a European accent. Yaffa Eliach, professor of history and literature at Brooklyn College in New York, sounds younger than her 57 years; her gentle tone belies the horror she lived through as a child.

Eliach, who will be keynote speaker at a May 1 dinner co-sponsored by Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario region and the Holocaust Remembrance Committee of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, was named 1994 Woman of the Year by CBS This Morning for her Tower of Faces exhibit at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington.

The display, a 1,500-photograph depiction of pre-war Jewish life in Eliach's hometown of Ejszyszki, lines the walls of a three-storey tower.

Ejszyszki was a Lithuanian Jewish shtetl established in 1073 not far from Vilna. No Jews remain there today.

"I think it's a terrible mistake that so many financial resources are placed on the destruction itself and very little time and money ... is spent to try to preserve as much of the magnificent, dynamic, creative life that was lost," Eliach said.

Eliach's early childhood memories include the town's synagogue (now a sports complex), which at the time had a pagoda-style roof. "I remember very well where my mother and grandmother sat. I remember sitting on the rabbi's lap, and running down to my father."

It's remarkable that Eliach herself has chosen not to focus on the destruction during the Holocaust. One of only 29 survivors out of 3,500 Ejszyszki Jews, Eliach was in hiding with her family when a 1941 massacre decimated the town's Jewish population. Three months after liberation her mother and infant brother were murdered by local Poles. Her father was exiled to Siberia.

Eliach and a surviving brother left Ejszyszki with a handful of photos, the legacy of their mother, Zipporah Sonenson, and maternal grandparents Yitzhak Uri and Alte Katz, who were all professional photographers.

In 1979, when Eliach was in Eastern Europe as a member of then-U.S. president Jimmy Carter's Holocaust Commission, she decided to single-handedly research and document the pre-war Jewish life of her hometown.

Many of the photos she tracked down — in a search that took her to six continents — were taken by her grandparents. Some had been sent to former inhabitants who had already emigrated.

Eliach noted the modern garb depicted in most photographs. Because of the influence of radio, newspapers and television, "whatever was the fashion in New York was the fashion in Ejszyszki," she explained.

In all, she collected almost 8,000 photos and enough material to write a comprehensive 900-year history of Ejszyszki. The Shtetl Book, a hardcover volume suitable for coffee table display, is scheduled for publication in 1996.

Last month, a documentary about Eliach's work appeared on German public television. When interviewed for this article, she was preparing 70 of her Ejszyszki photos as a gift for a soon-to-be-opened Holocaust museum in Hiroshima, Japan. The museum will be dedicated to the memory of the 1.5 million Jewish children who perished in the Holocaust.

"I see myself as a link in a very long chain of Jewish history, Jewish tradition, Jewish life," she said, "and I feel as a part of that chain, it's my obligation to link to the past and link to the future."

JEWISH WOMEN'S FEDERATION TOGETHER 1995 UJA WOMEN'S CAMPAIGN

JEWISH WOMEN'S FEDERATION IS A DEPARTMENT OF THE JEWISH FEDERATION OF GREATER TORONTO

A Celebration of Women Marks Installation

The annual combined installation of the United Jewish Appeal Women's Campaign and Jewish Women's Federation held recently had as its theme A Celebration of Women. And, what an abundance of deserving women attended this event.

A highlight was a personal and moving speech by Marlene Axmith as she accepted the position of Chairman of the 1996 UJA Women's Campaign.

She spoke of her childhood in Toronto, her experiences at camp the summer she, as a counsellor, encountered "a group of children, speaking no English who fled the Hungarian revolution and were spending the summer at camp while their parents, with the help of the Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, embarked on a new life."

She shared the memories of the influences in her life which led to the position she now holds: the many committees at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, the efforts to establish the Bayview branch of United Synagogue Day School, and most importantly, the 1988 UJA Community Mission to Israel. For Axmith, this trip was "a first look at the vibrant, wonderful place...which awakened in me a love for the country and its people."

Glennie Lindenberg, continuing as President of Jewish Women's Federation, chaired the meeting and spoke of the strengths and capabilities of the many women she had the pleasure of working with over the past year. She emphasized her satisfaction at the close ties being reinforced between Women's Campaign and JWF which were evident in the many projects being undertaken jointly, as well as many committees being co-chaired by representatives from each organization.

Reflecting on her year as Chairman of UJA Women's Campaign, outgoing Chairman Barbara Bank remarked on Purim which had been recently celebrated. "It is the story of the triumph of faith and prayer over terror and cruelty. It is the story of yesterday's victims emerging as today's victors. It is the story of our people and the work that we do." In thanking her campaign executive she reflected on the importance of their efforts. "The strength and determination of each of you...and what we are able to accomplish is nothing short of miraculous. The women I met in the former Soviet Union who risk their lives daily to rescue others are modern day Esthers and each one of them and the miracles they perform create a powerful link back to us." The women who participate in Women's Campaign come from all walks of life and are all ages. From the campaign-wide launch in August to the Young Women's Outreach Project to the "dollar a day" Project 365 to the Lion of Judah to the telethons, women reach out to women in our community.

Worth celebrating is Carol Kassel, Co-Chair of the 1996 UJA Campaign, who brought a special welcome from the General Campaign. She noted the influential role women have played throughout the generations. "The Ezrat Nashim Society led to the creation of Mount Sinai Hospital and Baycrest, the Toronto Hebrew Ladies Aid Society created a Jewish orphanage and Jewish day nursery which became part of the Jewish Family and Child Service..." She remarked that according to Stephen Speisman, the archivist for the Toronto Jewish community, "while the pictures which line the halls in some of the major Jewish institutions of Toronto are those of male leaders, it was the women who were instrumental in creating these same institutions."

Bernard Ghert, bringing greetings as President of Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, emphasized the integral role JWF and Women's Campaign have played in the life of our community and how their organization symbolizes in many ways the striving for continuity.

UJA Women's Campaign and Jewish Women's Federation are proud of the levels of achievement of their leadership. They can and do inspire others by their commitment and success. Truly this evening provided ample reason to celebrate.

Women and Substance Abuse: Confronting The Truth

Over the past few years the Social and Political Action Committee of Jewish Women's Federation has gained a justifiable reputation for dynamic, pertinent programming that empowers women to learn, to take charge, and where necessary, to promote change.

In the past years programs have successfully presented issues of importance such as raising a mensch, feminization of poverty, violence against women, women's health care and the image of women, and have brought about ongoing advocacy on behalf of these issues.

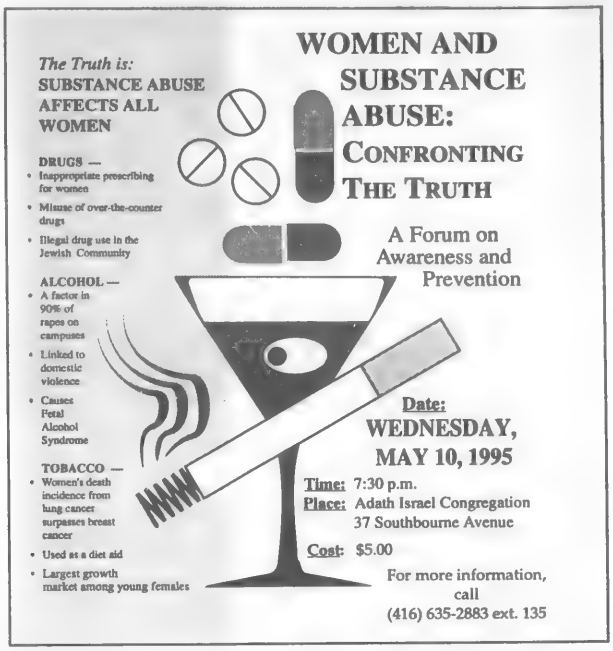
"Enriching our community is one of our prime concerns," says Glennie Lindenberg, President of JWF. "By bringing to the community issues of importance to Jewish women, we are fulfilling a vital part of our mandate."

On Wednesday, May 10, the Social and Political Action Committee will again challenge the community to become pro-actively involved in a topic that concerns us all. Women and substance abuse will be the focal point of this year's program. Substance abuse, as a woman's issue, has long been overlooked by society in general.

Alcohol during pregnancy, the overmedication of women, the surpassing of breast cancer by lung cancer as a killer of women and the co-relation of trauma and addiction are just some of the many issues specific to women.

How can Jewish women deal with these issues in a culture that has always held addictions to be "not our problem?" Only through awareness of the existence of substance abuse and by ending the denial in our community can we begin to address our needs and exercise prevention for ourselves and our daughters.

"Jewish women have always been leaders in areas of social concern and we as a group can be effective in mobilizing change," insists Jill Reitman, Vice President of JWF. Co-Chairs of the program, Agi Mandel and Marina Shear are excited by the positive response they have already received. "We need to acknowledge these issues which have been hidden for too long."



The Truth is:
SUBSTANCE ABUSE AFFECTS ALL WOMEN
DRUGS —
• Inappropriate prescribing for women
• Misuse of over-the-counter drugs
• Illegal drug use in the Jewish Community
ALCOHOL —
• A factor in 90% of rapes on campuses
• Linked to domestic violence
• Causes Fetal Alcohol Syndrome
TOBACCO —
• Women's death incidence from lung cancer surpasses breast cancer
• Used as a diet aid
• Largest growth market among young females

Denial is part of the disease

Denial is part of the disease of chemical dependency. The Jewish community denies it, the family denies it, and the abuser denies it. Because of this denial, we tend to wait until we are in a crisis or in the late stages of chemical addiction before seeking help.

Dr. Abraham Twerski, a psychiatrist and Rabbi in New York City and an authority on chemical dependency, observes that the Jewish community is particularly adept at denying substance abuse. No one knows or can know what the incidence of drug abuse is within the observant Jewish community. But studies show that it does occur and any incidence is too much.

Rather than argue about prevalence, attention should be directed toward the following question: If drug abuse can occur within an observant family, what can I do to minimize the risk in my family? If we realize the gravity of the condition, we should be willing to do anything and everything to prevent it. This is valid for Jews of all denominations.

Drugs, alcohol and tobacco use definitely are a problem in the Jewish community. To observe this fact, one needs only to attend an open AA meeting, visit a university fraternity or sorority, or speak with social workers and addiction counsellors. Visit a high school or junior high at lunch time and observe the girls outside smoking instead of eating lunch. As well, Jewish women and particularly elderly women are vulnerable to alcoholism and overmedication by prescription drugs.

Jews do drink, take drugs and smoke and do abuse those substances. We must open our eyes to these problems, and take steps to confront the myth and the reality. It is time to educate ourselves, our families and the Jewish community. Finally, it is time to stop denying.

Get-ting Away From It All

"It was a wonderful weekend, because it was very much a learning weekend... but still joyful!" Such were the sentiments of Joyce Eklove, who attended the "Get Education Retreat" from March 10 to 12 at the B'nai Brith Camp in the Laurentian Highlands. Fifty-nine women from across Canada met to educate themselves on the problems surrounding the 'Get' or Jewish Divorce.

The retreat was organized by the Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get. The Coalition is made up of seven women's organizations - B'nai Brith Women, Na'amat, National Council of Jewish Women, Hadassah-WIZO, Emunah Women, Toronto Women's ORT, and Jewish Women's Federation. The goal of the Coalition is to educate and sensitize the community on Get issues, and support and publicize the Federal legislation on this important subject.

For example explained Eklove, a member of the Toronto Coalition, and Chairman of the JWF Agunah Rights Committee, "we are trying to get every Jewish organization to refuse to allow anyone who is withholding a Get to be in a leadership position. As well we offer emotional support for the Agunah." (An "Agunah" is a woman who cannot remarry because she cannot obtain a Jewish Divorce.)

The weekend retreat offered workshops, speakers, and a chance to network, learn and relax within a beautiful setting. Norma Joseph presented an Halachic perspective, while lawyer Linda Schacter spoke from a practical point of view on the legal steps necessary to obtain a Get. Wendy Bryans enlightened the group on how the Canadian Federal Law Amendment 21.1 came into existence and on the vital role the Coalition played in its acceptance by the Government.

Etty Danzig, President of Na'amat commented, "it was wonderful to see all the different organizations working together. It was very hopeful because now communities across Canada will be setting up their own committees so that this issue will be on their agendas."

Toronto's Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get sponsored a "Community Vigil for Agunot." On the evening of Ta'anit Esther, March 14th, about 70 people gathered at the Bathurst Jewish Centre to show their support for Agunot. The goal of the vigil was to sensitize the community to the plight of the Agunah and to educate the public about current legislation. Rabbi Mark Dratch was the guest speaker. Shown above at the podium is Esther Rodzynek.

Jewish Women's Federation, a department of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, is the umbrella organization for 50 Jewish women's volunteer organizations in Toronto. JWF brings together women from a broad spectrum of ideological backgrounds to network, to develop leadership skills, to address important social and political action issues and to help integrate new Canadians into the Jewish community.

JWF is open to all Jewish women's organizations which provide services to the local Jewish community and/or Israel, have been in existence for two years, manifest a clear organizational structure and support the United Jewish Appeal Campaign. If your organization would like to join the JWF "umbrella," please call Lisa Morrison at (416) 631-5704.

Taboo Wine Bar

"A Splash of New York in Upper Yonge Village"

Aimed at a mature, exclusive patronage, the Taboo Wine Bar and Grill offers fine wines, dining and dancing at reasonable prices, in an energetic, up-beat atmosphere.

Taboo's spacious premises hold a 96-seat dining room, a wine bar, and a dance floor where 60 couples can dance comfortably. Dance floor and restaurant are linked by a tunnel, which contains two lounges. At the wine bar, 11 red and 11 white wines are offered by the glass. For dining, there are 130 bottled vintages to choose from.

Chef Antonio de Luca apprenticed at the Windsor Arms, and worked at many European hotels with the Michelin one-star rating.

Taboo's international cuisine has a natural twist, like the delicately flavored rack of lamb served with spiced lentils. The seafood is also special, like the sushi grade tuna steak with ratatouille vegetables, roast new potatoes and tomato chilpotle.

The dining room is deep red with gold stencils, the dancing area deep royal purple with gold fleur-de-lis. Renaissance opulence contrasts with Japanese motifs like rice paper lampshades, and origami-like triangular wood forms in the wine bar.

The Taboo Wine Bar and Grill is at 2345 Yonge St. north of Eglinton. For reservations, call 488-8381.

Basque Restaurant and Piano Bar

Basque Restaurant & Piano Bar has the ingredients that make an excellent restaurant; the perfect location, warm atmosphere, excellent management, eager staff, and an experienced and highly regarded Chef, Michael Punzo

Basque Restaurant is located in a charming two-hundred year old building on the corner of Bay and Charles Street. It is one of the few mansions still standing in downtown Toronto and where La Scala Restaurant was for many years.

The atmosphere at Basque is warm, intimate, elegant, as well as impressive for business people. Basque has large fabulous party and meeting rooms for special occasions, such as business meetings or wedding receptions. Furthermore, Basque has a piano Bar and lounge with live entertainment.

The new management and staff at Basque are committed to excellence and have accepted the challenge of making Basque one of Toronto's best restaurants. New signs, and a new menu are some of the visible changes. A patio is also being planned for later this summer.

The cornerstone of every restaurant is a good Chef and Basque is fortunate to have Executive Chef Michael Punzo, one of Toronto's best and most experienced. Chef Punzo's culinary career took off when he enrolled at the Cordon Bleu Culinary Arts School in Paris, France. Chef Michael Punzo has already had the opportunity to show off his talent at The Four Seasons, Park Avenue, Paparazzi, and Aqua to mention a few. Now only thirty years old, but with twelve years of experience, Michael Punzo is the Executive Chef at Basque. Michael explains that his style is "classical" with a touch of California. At Basque he features Fresh market Cuisine with a California Flair. He only uses the best fresh fish, meats and vegetables. Furthermore, every plate Michael serves is a work of art. Color and design are as important to Michael as taste. The menu changes on a regular basis but could include: Cherrywood Smoked East Coast Salmon with Crisp Fried Leeks, Grilled New Potatoes and Tuna Aioli for $8.95, Grilled US Beef Tenderloin with curried figs, Honey, Coconut Milk, Sweet Potato Hay with Grilled portobellos for $17.95, and Grand Marnier Creme Brulee with Seasonal Fruits for $6. Basque is quickly becoming known for quality, presentation as well as reasonable prices.

With a great location, excellent staff, dedicated management and a Chef of Michael Punzo's statute, it seems that Basque has the ingredients that make an excellent restaurant.

History of Yiddish explored in U of T exhibit

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Finally there is an official English translation of the famous Yiddish command, Hakn a Tshaynik (Chop a Tea Kettle); it is in the Yiddish Panorama exhibit at Robarts Libarary until May 31, complete with a tea kettle.

Here is the translation by Torontonian Michael Wex: "A tea kettle has boiled dry and its lid is jumping up and down because it is empty."

The wit and humor case is one of 12 in the exhibit which reflects 1,000 years of Yiddish language, literature and culture.

Other illustrated examples of Yiddish sayings handed down from one generation to the next include: It will help like cups on a corpse; and a worm lies in horseradish and thinks there is no sweeter place to be. There is also a kokhlefel, a stirring spoon; and a longer loksh, a tall, thin person.

The rarest item, according to curator Barry Walfish, is the Worms Mahzor, in a case all of its own, and loaned by the Beth Tzedec Reuben and Helen Dennis Museum. Written in western Germany in 1272, and used in the great synagogue in Worms for hundreds of years, it contains the earliest recorded sentence in Yiddish, a two-line verse meaning, "May he who takes his festival prayer book to the synagogue have a good day."

The wide-ranging exhibit illustrates the richness of the Jewish Studies Program at the University of Toronto, said Prof. Adel Sedra, university provost. Yiddish Panorama is sponsored by the program, which is celebrating its 25th anniversary, and by the University of Toronto library.

A handsome and scholarly catalogue in English and Yiddish, edited by the curator, accompanies the exhibit, amplifying with fascinating details the various exhibit cases, including Yiddish literature of Israel, the Holocaust, the former Soviet Union, and Canada.

It has the first Yiddish book published in Canada, in 1915, in Toronto, Hersh's Book of Fables, by Hersh Hirsh, editor of the Daily Hebrew Journal, Toronto, and later of the Keneder Adler, Montreal.

A Haggadah printed in 1527, partially in Yiddish, is on display, as well as a copy of the only Yiddish literary monthly still being published (by Oxford University England Summer School) edited by 38-year-old David Katz.

The Soviet showcase has a book by Itzik Fefer, the Yiddish writer shot by Stalin May 12, 1952. It includes a paean by Fefer to the Soviet leader: "I am a Jew who drank from Stalin's wonder cup of happiness."

The showcase on Yiddish literature in Israel reflects the fact that Israel publishes more Yiddish books than any other country, according to Walfish. Unfortunately, the number published world wide is decreasing, he said.

It will be on the second floor of Robarts until the end of April and then in a reduced form in May on the first floor. Until May 4, the library hours are 8:30 a.m. to midnight Monday to Friday, 9 a.m. to 10 p.m. Saturday, and 1 p.m. to 10 p.m. Sunday. For hours after May 4, phone 978-8450.

Proclamation
Holocaust Remembrance Day
April 27, 1995

Holocaust Remembrance Day is a day to commemorate the victims of the Holocaust. This year also marks the 50th Anniversary of the defeat of Nazism by Allied Forces and the liberation of the survivors from the concentration camps.

The horror of the Holocaust must never be forgotten. All members of our society must acknowledge and remember the loved ones and communities which perished; the difficulties Holocaust survivors have had in rebuilding their broken lives; and the many brave and dedicated people who fought valiantly for the defeat of Nazism and victory in Europe.

I am honoured, on behalf of my colleagues on City Council, to recognize the significance of this special day, particularly to the Jewish community of Toronto, by proclaiming April 27, 1995 as Holocaust Remembrance Day.

Survivor captures horrors of post-war Europe in book

By JACK KOHANE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — "Long after the war, men will not be able to look each other in the eye without reading the question: How is it you happened to survive? How did you do it?" After the Smoke Cleared, a new book by Holocaust survivor Jack Kuper begins with the above words written by Janusz Korczak.

Likely to become a best-selling classic, as did its predecessor Child of the Holocaust (first published in 1967), this autobiographical sequel takes us past the horrors of post-war Europe and reunites Kuper with his father after decades of enforced separation following the Nazi occupation of Poland.

The books essentially form a continuum which help Kuper come to terms with the ghosts of his own Holocaust experiences, in an effort to finally put them to rest.

Written through the eyes 9-year-old Jankel Kuperblum (Kuper), Child of the Holocaust details the terrors he felt and the horrors he witnessed on a daily basis.

"It was a terrible, cruel time, particularly for the young," Kuper explains. "It took me almost five years to complete the book. Many events that began to well up in my memory were so painful to describe that I often broke down and wept for many hours. I could not continue writing until much later."

By the end of the war, Kuper blum had for so long denied his Jewish background, almost forgotten his family, and encountered so much hatred in his journeys about the Polish countryside, that he himself became an anti-Semite.

Kuper says he received hundreds of requests from readers and academics who studied Child of the Holocaust to complete the story of Jankel Kuperblum, to find out what later became of him.

"The question was how to present it," says Kuper. "The reunification with my father later provided the necessary framework for After the Smoke Cleared, and after several rewrites, the resulting work came together as an almost uninterrupted progression from 1945 to the present."

The book is an intense and passionate first-hand account. Where the first book revealed the strength of the human spirit to rise above the mayhem and destruction of war, After the Smoke Cleared provides an insight into how one manages to cope with the memories of the Holocaust.

Kuper describes his coming to Canada in 1952, settling in Toronto, changing his name to a more anglicized version and raising a family.

After a successful advertising career, he became an award-winning film-maker, playwright and author.

Kuper relates his guilt about having survived the war. He confesses to not being devoutly religious. "God died in the concentration camps," he writes.

He also refers to his profound disillusionment with the materialism that seems to obsess many in the community today. Kuper is riddled with guilt when a friend rails against his dedication to advertising. "You survived the Holocaust only to make commercials?" his friend charges. "How will you explain this to your children?"

At the core of After the Smoke Cleared is the strained emotion Kuper experiences when he again comes face to face with his father.

It is not only many years that separate them, but also culture (his father remained in Russia after the war), attitude towards life and the observance of traditional Jewish rituals.

Most importantly, the author is gripped by his personal history and his "survival guilt," whereas his father is not troubled by any of these. His father lives for the moment, refuses to permit worry to impede his enjoyment of the present, and harbors none of the phantoms that plague his son.

A seemingly unbridgeable chasm develops between them. But through pain, shame, loathing and loss of innocence, the son ultimately begins to understand his father's philosophy and motivations. The reader is left with a yearning to learn if any reconciliation between the protagonists is possible.

With the critical success After the Smoke Cleared has already achieved, we may be witnessing the emergence of an entirely new literary genre of Jewish writing.

At the gates of Buchenwald

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Henry Schwab, a German-born Jew who emigrated to the United States in 1936, enlisted in the U.S. Army and reached the gates of Buchenwald concentration camp just days after it was liberated in April 1945.

"It was a day never to be forgotten, coming face to face with some of the horrors," he recalls in a recent book. "This, no doubt, reinforced my commitment to do my part to always remember."

Having lost many relatives in the Shoah, Schwab felt determined to help document the horror they had experienced. He did this by preserving some family mail that had survived the devastation of war-torn Europe. Soon he became a collector of all forms of written communications from the period.

Schwab's collection of original postal material, cards, envelopes and letters sent through regular mail channels in Nazi-occupied Europe during the Holocaust is now an exhibition entitled The Echoes That Remain. It has been shown at stamp exhibitions in many countries, as well as in universities, libraries and religious institutions.

Schwab's recent book, also called The Echoes That Remain, features hundreds of items from this unique collection. They include prewar postcards bearing anti-Semitic caricatures; cards to German Jews stamped Abgereist (moved with no forwarding address); cards sent into and out of Lodz, Theresienstadt, Lublin and other Jewish ghettoes; mail sent between ghettoes; and cards sent into and out of internment and concentration camps such as Auschwitz.

Describing himself as a postal historian, Schwab says that inmates of Auschwitz and other concentration camps were permitted to send and receive mail, although regulations were many and continually changing, and censorship was strict.

At one point, for instance, writers in Auschwitz were required to use the term Schutzhaeftling — (in protective custody) when identifying themselves on envelopes.

The author identifies the various rubber stamps and postmarks used by censors and postal authorities. He also explains the many euphemisms used. For instance, one writer says that his family is "going on a trip," rather than that they are about to be deported.

"Desperation, daring and ingenuity by senders is evident through concealed meanings in the message and by the use of code words, Yiddish expressions, and language used that seemed innocent," he writes. "Yet the true meaning in most cases was apparent to the recipient."

Unaffected by censors, some mailed messages reproduced here provide a sad reminder of the horrific upheavals that each of the millions of Jews of Europe endured. Each piece of mail tells its own tragic story.

One card, written in Poland in 1941, carries a desperate message: "... need money ... am near the end of my wits ... ill and without any means ... not even enough to buy a piece of bread ...." The writer asks the recipient to notify his brother, who had escaped to Shanghai, of his whereabouts.

The Echoes That Remain provides documentary evidence in minute everyday detail. The book should interest historians, philatelists, survivors and students of the Holocaust. It is available through the publisher, the Cardinal Spellman Philatelic Museum, 235 Wellesley St., Weston MA 02193.

A related volume — Poland and Holocaust Philatelic History, 1939-1945, by Edward T. Superson, appeared several years ago. It is available for $50 from Emil Talacko, 230 Glengrove Ave. W., Toronto M4R 1P3; phone (416) 485-1059.

Pollard's release urged by Israel, U.S. Jews

Possible spy swap in works

Jewish Telegraphic Agency and CJN Staff

WASHINGTON — With a parole hearing approaching for convicted spy Jonathan Pollard, efforts for his release are being stepped up by the Israeli government and the American Jewish community.

These efforts came amid reports last week of a possible spy swap that could free Pollard.

But President Bill Clinton and the State Department denied any knowledge of such a deal, which would involve the United States, Israel and Russia.

And the Toronto-based Citizens for Justice for Jonathan Pollard, Canada called the reports "damaging" and "ludicrous," arguing that since Pollard is a U.S. citizen, the American government would never publicly agree to swap him to a foreign country.

The Canadian group said the rumors could shift attention away from Pollard's parole hearing, which could come as soon as next month, and it called on Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin to disavow the report.

Israeli news reports said the Jewish state had proposed the swap to secure the release of Pollard, currently serving a life sentence for spying for Israel, and of Marcus Klingberg, who is serving an 18-year prison term in Israel for spying for the former Soviet Union. Russia, in turn, would release unnamed American agents.

Jonathan Pollard with wife Esther, of Toronto, in a recent photograph taken at his Butner, N.C. prison.

Pollard, a former U.S. civilian Navy analyst, would be eligible for parole in November, the 10th anniversary of his arrest, if his scheduled May hearing is successful.

The Israeli government's desire to resolve the Pollard case was reportedly made clear earlier this month by Elyakim Rubinstein, the former longtime Israeli cabinet secretary who now heads Israel's negotiating team with Jordan.

Rubinstein was in Washington, where he had meetings on Capitol Hill and with the administration concerning Pollard.

Rubinstein described these contacts in an April 12 address to the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations.

Following the address, the Jewish group took its first-ever position asking for Pollard's release. In letters sent to the White House and the U.S. Parole Commission, the Conference of Presidents said Pollard "has already paid a heavy price for his crime" and should be paroled on humanitarian grounds.

The letters follow a similar one sent by the National Jewish Community Relations Advisory Council (NJCRAC) to the parole commission.

It was under NJCRAC auspices that a committee of Jewish organizations first discussed the Pollard matter in the wake of his 1987 sentencing, and decided at the ume that since there was no compelling evidence of anti-Semitism in the case, the Jewish community would not take a stance.

As Pollard's time in prison lengthened, and as an increasing number of grassroots groups rallied to his cause, mainstream Jewish organizations across the U.S. and Canada gradually came on board seeking varying degrees of clemency for Pollard.

Rubinstein's may be the most high-profile effort on behalf of Pollard to date, although Rabin has raised the issue with Clinton more than once.

Rubinstein reportedly said the White House is not convinced Pollard is an important issue for the American Jewish community.

According to Seymour Reich, the former chair of the Conference of Presidents who has taken a leading role on behalf of Pollard, support from the Israeli government and the American Jewish community is crucial if Pollard is to be released, in the face of expected opposition from the U.S. intelligence community.

"The trick now is for the president to understand that this is a key issue for the Israeli government and the American Jewish community. And it's the latter that has been lacking," Reich said.

The Conference of Presidents letter noted that Pollard has "expressed remorse for his actions and said it was never his intent to harm the United States.

"While there is no justification for his misguided actions, we believe he has already paid a heavy price for his crime," the letter said.

Last week, U.S. Senator Arlen Specter became the first presidential candidate to promise to commute Pollard's sentence if elected.

"Jonathan Pollard has served long enough," said Specter, who is seeking the Republican presidential nomination.

Israel rejects terror accord

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel last week rejected an agreement that was reportedly reached between the Palestinian Authority (PA) and its fundamentalist opposition.

Under the reported terms of the agreement, the self-rule government would release fundamentalist activists, in exchange for an end to terror attacks against Israelis inside the autonomous areas.

But Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin said Sunday that under any such agreement, Hamas and Islamic Jihad would have to declare an end to all terror attacks against Israelis — not only in the self-rule zones, but throughout the West Bank and within Israel as well.

"We will not accept any agreements between the Palestinian Authority and extremist terrorists — the Islamic Jihad and Hamas — if they do not [stop] all activities inside the autonomy and outside of it," he said.

Rabin was speaking to reporters in Hebron, where a week earlier an undercover border police unit killed three Hamas terrorists who were believed to have been behind the deaths of at least six Israelis.

The killings of the three Hamas members sparked rioting last weekend. A 17-year-old Palestinian was killed and five others wounded when Israel Defence Force (IDF) troops opened fire on stone-throwers at the Kalandia refugee camp north of Jerusalem.

While in Hebron, Rabin was briefed by IDF officers about last week's operation against the three Hamas members.

He also met with settler leaders, who said plans to withdraw the Israeli army from Palestinian population centres in the West Bank could endanger Jewish residents in the area. The withdrawal is scheduled to take place as part of the next phase of extending autonomy to the Palestinians, as called for under the terms of the self-rule accord.

But Rabin told the settler leaders that for the time being the withdrawal would not take place because of continuing terror attacks by fundamentalist groups opposed to the peace process.

Meanwhile, Israel Television reported that the Islamic Jihad denied having pledged to stop terror attacks against Israelis.

An Islamic Jihad spokesman, attributing the announcement of an agreement to the PA, said contacts are continuing between members of the self-rule government and the fundamentalist opposition, in an effort to calm tensions in the Gaza Strip.

Talks were reportedly held between the PA and officials from Hamas and the Islamic Jihad after the two groups launched separate suicide bombing attacks in Gaza on April 9, killing seven Israelis and an American woman studying in Israel.

A subsequent crackdown by Arafat led to the detention of hundreds of militants, jail sentences for several fundamentalist activists and warnings of weapons confiscations. The crackdown led some militant leaders to warn of a violent confrontation with the Palestinian Authority.

Terrorist, neo-Nazi links discovered

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — An unusual alliance among Jewish groups tracking anti-Semitism worldwide has uncovered a new kind of ideological collaboration between Islamic terrorists and neo-Nazis.

The Anti-Defamation League, the World Jewish Congress, Tel Aviv University and the Anti-Semitism Monitoring Forum of the Israeli Government's Secretariat teamed up to compile a new report, titled Anti-Semitism Worldwide: 1994.

It includes a country-by-country examination of anti-Semitic incidents and trends in Western Europe, Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union, as well as in North Africa, South Africa, North America, Latin America, Australia and Japan [CJN, April 20].

The joint report was presented before its April 10 release to Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin. Its sponsoring organizations plan to present it to the Knesset, the U.S. administration and Congress, the UN Human Rights Committee and the European Parliament.

The study found that violent anti-Semitic activities have escalated around the world.

It also discovered an increasing cross-pollination of ideas and tactics between Muslim fundamentalists and neo-Nazis.

"While part of the anti-Semitism in Christian countries in recent decades has turned into anti-Zionism, in the Muslim world, anti-Zionism appears to be turning into anti-Jewish manifestations, thus broadening a political and territorial conflict into a matter of clashing ideological and religious world views," the study says.

The report noted the rise of Muslim extremist activity against Jews in Western Europe. In general, violent attacks in Western Europe doubled last year, rising from 15 to 31.

By the end of 1993, in Germany alone, there were 14 extremist Islamic groups with an overall membership of about 21,000, according to the study.

The report traces the influence and support of these groups to extremist Islamic forces in the Middle East and North Africa, notably Iran, Sudan, Lebanon and Algeria.

As "a significant example" of this cross-breeding phenomenon, the report cites the Swedish radio station Radio Islam, which broadcasts a mix of "extreme anti-Semitic and anti-Israeli propaganda" and presents "the ideas of European Holocaust-deniers and neo-Nazis."

The study found "a sharp rise" in the number of anti-Semitic attacks in the wake of last February's Hebron massacre, in which a Jewish settler killed 29 Arab worshipers in a Hebron mosque.

"Violent activities by Muslim extremists were particularly evident in France and England, where a number of attacks and attempted attacks were mounted against Jewish targets," the report says.

"These included booby-trapped cars, Molotov cocktails, shootings and stabbings, and vandalism."

In Great Britain, the number of seriously violent attacks rose to six, from zero in 1993. This figure include the two car bomb attacks in London last summer, one of which was against the Israeli consulate.

"In Belgium, where a significant increase in violence was registered, Islamic extremists were behind most of the incidents," the report noted.

Increase in incidents

In Germany, where anti-Semitic incidents of all kinds doubled from 1993 to 1994, "the media frequently reported Jewish institutions and individuals receiving threats from Arab fundamentalists."

When speaking of the 100 per cent increase in reported incidents in Germany, however, the study cautions that German citizens are increasingly inclined to report such incidents and police and security forces have become more sensitive to hate crimes.

Incidents and trends noted in other areas of the world include:

• In Japan, popular books warn against Jewish and Zionist plots to destroy Japan in a matter of years.

• In the United States, black Muslims accused Jews of having been slave traders and of deflecting attention from that by fabricating the Holocaust, thus overshadowing the suffering of blacks.

• In the former Soviet Union, Jews were accused of having initiated the Bolshevik Revolution, and then of destroying communism. According to these accusations, the Jews subsequently found shelter in Israel, where they were rewarded for their crimes.

• Even in Brazil, where racial mixture has been and still is for many a social ideal, a Jewish gubernatorial candidate in the state of Parana, Jaime Lerner, was slandered by an Evangelist minister who accused him of being God's enemy. A political opponent called him a "Jewish-Nazi candidate," according to the study.

The Week in Israel

April 17:

• Druse residents on the Golan Heights marked Syrian Independence Day with parades and a shutdown of shops and offices in their villages. A large police force was sent in case of rioting, but the marches were peaceful and orderly. Hundreds of people gathered on the Syrian side of the border and broadcast speeches on loudspeakers to the Israeli side.

• Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert may be summoned for questioning for allegedly firing one of his deputies, Meshulam Amit, who filed a complaint with police about financial wrongdoings at City Hall, police sources said. The national fraud squad has yet to determine whether to open an investigation into the complaint filed by Amit, which alleged that since 1989, the city has sold off properties illegally to raise cash for various projects, including the new City Hall building.

April 18:

• Talks with Syria on security issues have failed, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres said. A more comprehensive dialogue should be established, he added. Speaking on Israel Television, Peres said discussions on security — one of four elements in the negotiations — have not yielded results.

• Senior Jordanian army generals visited Israel in the two years preceding the signing of the peace treaty, and their meetings with Israeli army officers helped pave the way for the agreement, disclosed Brig.-Gen. Baruch Spiegel, who led the Israeli negotiating team.

April 19:

• Israel revealed that a Russian emigre who worked in an Israeli weapons factory is serving a 13-year prison term for spying for the former Soviet Union. Gregory Kalman Lunden was arrested in 1988, convicted and sentenced in a secret trial, according to documents released by Israel's Supreme Court.

April 21:

• Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Israel Meir Lau said he is attempting to prevent the participation of the Jewish-born Roman Catholic cardinal of Paris, Jean-Marie Lustiger, in a conference at Tel Aviv University. Rabbi Lau lashed out at organizers for issuing the invitation to Lustiger, and at Lustiger himself for not repenting and returning to the Jewish fold.

Sarajevo Haggadah read at seder

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

SARAJEVO — The legendary Sarajevo Haggadah made its third appearance in 50 years last Saturday at a noon seder in this city's only synagogue.

The seder was held during the day because of spotty electricity and increasingly aggressive sniper fire as the three-year-old war raged on.

Along with some 70 of the remaining Jews of the city and kosher wine and matzah provided by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, several high-level Bosnian officials were there, including President Alija Izetbegovic, Prime Minister Harris Siladzic and Cultural Minister Enis Karic.

But the special guest at the seder was the more than 600-year-old Sarajevo Haggadah.

Its greatness first came to light after a poor Sephardi Jew named Kohen sold it in 1894 to the city's National Museum. Curators in Vienna recently assessed its worth as a great medieval manuscript at $7 million.

The Haggadah has never actually belonged to the Jewish community in Sarajevo. It dates back to 14th-century northern Spain, probably Barcelona.

The book narrowly escaped the clutches of a high-ranking Nazi book collector, who demanded in 1941 that the museum director turn it over to him. But the director, Joze Petrovic, told the Nazi another German official had taken it only moments before. In fact, a Muslim scholar had agreed to hide the manuscript until the end of the war.

In an indication of the relations that were once possible in Sarajevo, it was a Serb who lied to the Nazi about the Haggadah while a Muslim hid it, said Jewish community president Ivan Ceresnjes.

Since World War II, the Haggadah was seen only briefly on two occasions — once in 1966 at the 400th anniversary celebration of the Jewish community of Sarajevo and then in 1988, as part of an exhibit of Jews in Yugoslavia.

The Haggadah surfaced for only one reason last week, according to officials: to dispel rumors that the Bosnian government had sold it for arms, or that it had been ruined or stolen.

All rumors were laid to rest when Resad Gogalija, an employee of the Ministry of Culture, stood before the assembled crowd, displaying page after magnificent page.

The book appeared in remarkably good shape. Although measuring only 6.5 by eight inches, the brilliant blues and golds were more lively than any reproduction.

Bringing the book out of hiding sparked major debate. National Museum director Envir Imamovic resigned in protest, and Jewish community leaders were told of government plans to send the book out of Sarajevo for restoration and exhibition.

Thus, the ancient treasure of Bosnia, rarely seen over the centuries, has gone back into hiding once again.

Congressmen back Jewish property claims

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Eight U.S. congressional leaders, including Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich and Senate Majority Leader Robert Dole, have joined the fight to help Eastern European Jewish communities reclaim property lost during World War II.

In an April 10 letter to Secretary of State Warren Christopher, the legislators accused 13 Eastern European countries of restricting rights to Jewish and other assets.

These assets, valued at billions of dollars, were plundered by the Nazis and then nationalized by the communists.

The Eastern European countries have burdensome restitution laws with cut-off dates, and measures preventing non-residents and non-citizens from making claims.

The congressional letter warns that "it should be made clear to the countries involved that their response on this matter will be seen as a test for their respect for basic human rights and the rule of law and could have practical consequences on their relations with our country."

The bipartisan letter also calls on the countries — Belarus, Bulgaria, the Czech Republic, Estonia, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Moldova, Poland, Romania, Russia, Slovakia and Ukraine — to enact legislation providing for prompt restitution.

"It is a matter of both law and justice," the letter said.

The letter comes on the heels of a personal plea from World Jewish Congress President Edgar Bronfman, who went to Capitol Hill to lobby lawmakers on the issue.

Departure delay

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Bureaucratic snafus may delay this week's departure from Israel and the territories of Muslim pilgrims bound for Mecca.

Last Sunday, it was agreed that pilgrims from the territories will be given Jordanian transit passes, which will also be given to Israeli Muslims.

In the past, Saudi Arabia insisted that the roughly 4,000 pilgrims from the West Bank and the 3,000 from Israel all travel on Israeli passports, but Jerusalem objected.

Militias' anti-Semitism tracked targets not only traditional victims — racial and religious minorities — but even more so, government and government employees."

Some estimates suggest there are over 10,000 people connected with the militia movement in over 30 states, the report says, adding that in the weeks prior to the Oklahoma City bombing, members made a number of death threats against government employees.

The New York-based Anti-Defamation League (ADL) says the leaders of the Militia of Montana have been members of the violent Aryan Nations, based in Idaho.

In a report released last autumn, the ADL noted that the leader of the Patriots in Colorado is an adherent of the anti-Semitic Christian Identity movement. The ADL says it has evidence of paramilitary activity in at least 13 states.

Members of militias believe the government is overly intrusive and a threat to their freedom because of gun-control measures, taxes, law enforcement and land use. The AJC report says some members believe Washington has set up 43 concentration camps for U.S. dissidents.

In Canada, far-right groups associated with U.S. extremists also appear to be preparing for violence. Bernie Farber of Canadian Jewish Congress warned in a weekend television interview.

"These people are stockpiling arms," said Farber. "But even more important, the fact that groups like the [neo-Nazi] Heritage Front and others have created an umbrella to bring these lunatic fringes under, and to spoonfeed them hatred, creates the the attitude for this kind of situation to develop."

In a weekend interview with the Toronto Star, Heritage Front leader Wolfgang Droege denied his group is readying for any violent confrontation with authorities.

Some observers have pointed out that the Oklahoma City bombing bears a chilling resemblance to events in The Turner Diaries, a 1978 novel that became a bible for U.S. white supremacists and neo-Nazis.

In the book, a small group opposed to the government carbombs a federal building with a mixture of ammonium-nitrate fertilizer and fuel oil — exactly the deadly formula used in Oklahoma City. Plans in the fictionalized account called for the blast to punch through two levels of reinforced concrete and blow the facade off a building.

War crime case delayed

Canadian Jewish Congress president Irving Abella condemned Nemsila's remarks, calling them "despicable comments. They amount to the alleged victimizer attempting to turn himself into the victim through anti-Semitic slurs...It is shameful that someone would try to coat the murderous record of that unit under the guise of wartime patriotism."

Abella applauded the launch of proceedings against Nemsila while calling for further action against other suspects. "Immediate action should be taken. There is absolutely no reason for any delays."

B'nai Brith spokesperson Marvin Kurz said Monday's delay is not unexpected, given Nemsila did not have a lawyer. "The really troublesome delays have happened already. Why have we taken so long [to begin proceedings]?" he asked.

In recent months, Justice transferred to the Immigration Department 12 files of alleged Nazi war criminals for denaturalization and/or deportation. Immigration spokespeople have said the department will use four cases to establish legal precedents before proceeding with the other cases. That approach has drawn the ire of Jewish groups, which point to a snail's pace of legal efforts against alleged Nazi war criminals.

"When will they recognize that justice is not measured out in spoonfuls?" said B'nai Brith spokesperson Frank Dimant. "Where are the other cases?"

Of the four cases now being pursued by the Immigration Department, three involve Canadian citizens. Erichs Tobiass, 84, of North York, Ont., has been accused of participating in the mass execution of Jews in Nazi-occupied Latvia. The two other suspects have not been identified.

Since 1987 only four people have been charged under the Criminal Code. Imre Finta was acquitted and charges dropped in three other cases, including Reistetter's.

The unit's only success came in an immigration hearing involving Dutch Nazi collaborator Jacob Luitjens. He was stripped of his citizenship and deported.

Jewish impressionist's work showing in New York

By GERRY MORRIS
Special to The CJN

NEW YORK — The retrospective of Jewish impressionist painter Camille Pissarro (1830-1903), organized by and for the Israel Museum in Jerusalem, is now at the Jewish Museum in New York through July 16, 1995.

The exhibit presents Pissarro's life and art, from early paintings on the Caribbean Island of St. Thomas, where he was born and raised, through his late years as one of the recognized French masters of modern art.

Among the nearly 100 paintings and drawings (culled from a remarkable output of 5,000 works) are many from private collections which have never been publicly exhibited. Others are from such major institutions as the Musee d'Orsay in Paris, the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston, the J. Paul Getty Museum in Malibu and the Israel Museum in Jerusalem.

Pissarro was one of the founding fathers of the impressionist movement. Together with Claude Monet, Auguste Renoir, Alfred Sisley and others, he had both a revolutionary method of painting and a unique approach to subject matter.

The artists depicted the world around them in soft focus and muted colors: the French landscape, the Parisian suburbs of Louveciennes and Pontoise, the city views, the cafe scenes.

Pissarro's feeling for the countryside of France and those who peopled it comes through strongly in these marvellous works. Even his drawings and sepia washes reflect unaffected simplicity: female workers, market scenes, and the toll of ordinary people. Although he supported the most liberal social movement of his age, he had no desire to deliver a spiritual or political message, but only to portray nature with sensitivity and directness.

Neo-classical painter Fritz Melbye became one of his early inspirations, and together they travelled to Venezuela. Pissarro's first major exhibit took place in Paris in 1850, and he moved there in 1855. His style changed over the years, open to outside influence which created highly personal works. When the impressionist group held its first exhibition in 1874, it was Pissarro who compiled the association's legal charter.

Pissarro was born into a family of prosperous merchants. His father was a French Jew of Portuguese descent, his mother an older Creole related to her husband by marriage. Very early Pissaro showed an exceptional gift for drawing, and only after a struggle with his family did he commit himself to a career in painting.

Because he was able to take advantage of new opportunities to enter art schools and guilds previously closed to Jews, Pissarro became the first Jewish artist to receive international acclaim. In an era when Jews kept a distance between their cultural heritage and public lives, Pissarro's open identification with his Jewish background was rare.

For many years the impressionists were spurned by the art establishment and the public. Pissarro was well into middle age before he attained a degree of success and was often hard-pressed to support his wife and six children.

Pissarro experimented with different techniques but remained true to the ideals of impressionism right until his death at 73. Camille Pissarro: Impressionist Innovator does justice to both the man and his contribution to art.

The exhibit is on view at the Jewish Museum, 1109 Fifth Ave. at 92nd Street in Manhattan.

Manor Houses in Denmark: Some 400 manor houses and castles dot the pastorial landscape of Denmark, particularly in the eastern environs of Jutland and on Fenen and Zealand.

More than 20 such buildings have been converted into hotels offering varying degrees of luxury. Arguably the most splendid of these gems is Steensgaard Country House Hotel in southern Funen, a classic half-timbered structure dating back to 1310 and surrounded by a 27-acre park, complete with its own peaceful lake. There is also Dragsholm in Zealand, once a 13th-century bishop's palace, which boasts eight-foot-thick walls and a moat.

Other conversions include the nine-room Sophiendal Hotel in central Jutland and the 142-room Byghold Park Hotel outside Horsens. For more information on castle and manor house vacations in Denmark, contact The Danish Tourist Board, P.O. 636, Mississauga, Ont. L5M 2C2 Phone: 905-820-8984

RUSSIAN ROULETTE

Immigrants from the former Soviet Union are known for their innovative ideas. Hershel Greenberg, pictured here, an aeronautical engineer who made aliyah from the Ukraine in 1991, is no exception. With the aid of computer electronics and the financial backing of Israeli businessmen and Kiryat Gat's Economic Development Unit, Greenberg spent two years perfecting the ultimate multi-media roulette table; a game which he predicts will attract a new breed of gambler to casinos worldwide. With gambling still illegal in Israel, it may be some time before Israelis get a real taste of computerized gambling. Most of the orders come from England and East European countries. [WZPS photo]

Security firm protects high-profile professionals

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When some people think of a bodyguard, a stereotype comes to mind of a muscle-bound male with limited brainpower, who is out of place in the boardroom or a fancy restaurant.

But bodyguards have changed their image and today they tend to be more like the Gentlemen's Quarterly type played by Kevin Costner in the movie The Bodyguard. They are well educated, have good communication skills and are well trained, according to a private investigator who heads Executive Security Services International.

"They have to be able to blend in with associates, friends or relatives of their client," said Sunil Ram. "You can't stick out like a sore thumb."

He added a bodyguard without specialized training may be capable of driving adoring groupies away from a rock star, but he may not deter someone, especially a professional, who is out to seriously harm a client.

Ram prefers to use the updated term "protection specialist" to describe his professional associates, both male and female, who provide security for individuals who have reason to worry about their safety. Bankers are "prime candidates for kidnapping," he said, and celebrities may be the targets of mentally imbalanced fans.

A private investigator and a security specialist for 10 years, Ram, 29, has received training in counter-terrorism from members of the elite British commando Special Air Services (SAS).

Local synagogues used his security services during the High Holy Days when international terrorism posed a threat.

During an executive protection training program, Sunil Ram shows how he would protect Dr. Mark Blau in a confrontation.

Five-day training program

For the past three years, he has offered a five-day training program in VIP protection, which includes instruction in the psychology of terrorism, terrorist ambush techniques, unarmed combat and use of firearms.

Aside from his security specialty, Ram is available for a variety of investigative work, including insurance claims, fraud, arson, employee theft and industrial espionage.

Employee theft and industrial espionage, he said, can be countered by doing a thorough background check on potential employees, another service he provides.

If a background check uncovers ovewhelming personal debt, substance abuse (drugs or alcohol), or a history of gambling, it is a danger signal, he said, because a person with a checkered past is more likely to steal from the employer or become engaged in industrial espionage.

Ram does undercover investigations for employers concerned about internal theft or industrial espionage.

He recalls seeing a trucker stealing boxes of cigarettes out of the back of his employer's vehicle and he fingered the thief by using two of the tools of his trade — a 35 mm camera and a video camera. In the same surveillance operation, he also nailed a warehouse manager and an administrative employee who had conspired with the driver.

Industrial espionage — stealing ideas — is more prevalent than most companies care to admit, Ram believes. It happens when the employee who is leaving the company to start a business makes a copy of everything on his or her hard drive. Or it could be low tech — just a matter of photocopying a sensitive document that was left on a desktop. "Less than 10 per cent of businesses have adequate security," he says.

While investigating insurance claims, Ram said he has found people with "back problems" on the golf course and "people taking part-time jobs under the table when they should be at home resting."

Peter Graben Caterers

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Those dull, unsatisfying dinners put together in a hurry after work will be a thing of the past, thanks to Graben's Fine Foods. Peter Graben Caterers' new line of prepared foods.

The glatt kosher line, currently available at the Costco division of Price Club Costco, with plans to be in Highland Farms, Nortown, Food City and IGA, now features four soups, two herbed flatbreads, two dessert items and four main entrees. Peter Graben representative Lisa Wagman expects to have about 26 products on the market by summer.

The main course dinners for two, including grilled salmon with angel hair pasta, chicken teriyaki with fried rice or meat balls with rice pilaf, come ready to pop into the microwave. They can be frozen or kept in the refrigerator for about two weeks.

exploding stage in terms of our premises. We've proven there is a lot of business to be done when quality is not compromised," Wagman says.

Quality is indeed a primary concern at Peter Graben's. Under the direction of executive chef Jim Camara, who has been there for 15 years, they use only grade A federally inspected meats, poultry, fish and eggs and produce, handchosen daily from the market. They are committed to using Ontario grown produce and products whenever possible.

Wagman says home parties are still a large part of Peter Graben's business. "Catering comes complete with staff and kosher dishes and cutlery. We begin cooking in our kitchen and complete it at the party site so the food is always fresh and piping hot."

Take-out weekend specials are available at Peter Graben Caterer's main commissary, including main kitchen, pastry kitchen and offices operating at 1895 Leslie St.

Affordable meals

"These dinners are a quick way for single or working couples to have healthy, cost-conscious meals," Wagman says. "We aim at keeping the prices down."

Graben's Fine Foods is a natural outgrowing of Peter Graben Caterers' Limited, the 25-year-old company that began as synagogue caterers. Since the beginning, the company has been known for its exceptional food and service, as well as for maintaining the highest standards in its kitchen and off-premise venues.

Peter Graben Caterers now caters at Beth Tikvah Synagogue and Temple Sinai, and holds contracts at the Royal Ontario Museum, Casa Loma, the Crowne Plaza, Ford Centre for the Performing Arts, the Marriott Eaton Centre and the Estates of Sunnybrook (Vaughan Estates and Maclean House). As well, they supply all kosher airline meals for Air Canada, Canada 3000, British Airways, Swissair, Cathay Pacific and to many hospitals.

Cut Rates, Gov't Told

JERUSALEM — Pressure was mounting on the Bank of Israel last week to cut interest rates, after March inflation figures showed that consumer prices dropped unexpectedly last month by 0.1 per cent.

The last negative index was in May 1992, when prices dropped 0.4 per cent. The bank is expected to announce its monetary program for May within the next week.

Industry and Trade Minister Micha Harish, standing in for Finance Minister Avraham Shohat who is visiting in China, said the drop in inflation is excellent news and should lead to an early cut in interest rates.

Trade Deficit Hinders Growth

JERUSALEM — The economy is in need of a real devaluation, accompanied by a cut in the budget, industry and bank leaders said recently at a Manufacturers' Association emergency meeting.

Manufacturers' Association president Dan Propper said the economy's major problem is the trade deficit, which hinders growth and makes it more difficult to repay foreign currency obligations.

"The problem of Israel's trade deficit, which is expected to reach $11 billion (US) this year, is one of the economy's most pressing problems," Propper said. "The government and Bank of Israel must take immediate action."

Propper said the first 120 public companies to publish their financial statements for 1994 reported a drop in operating profit. He blamed the fall on the government's and Bank of Israel's monetary policy.

Open Letter To Shohat

JERUSALEM — The country's industry leaders and the Export Institute sent an open letter to Finance Minister Avraham Shohat last week, asking him for emergency measures to bring about a rise in export profitability.

"In its present state, market interest rates are too high for us," the letter said, citing the dollar's revaluation and inflation "which is higher than is acceptable in Western nations. We are bending under the weight of this burden and sending you this message: No more!"

The letter concluded with a call for action and was signed by some of the country's most important exporters, including: ECI, Elscint, Osem, Delta Galil, Vishay, Haifa Chemicals, Lannet, Motorola, Scitex, Elite and Tadiran.

Shamrock Pays $10 Million For Koor Shares

JERUSALEM — The U.S. Shamrock Group will give Hevrat Ha'ovdim a $10-million (US) down payment as part of its purchase of 22.5 per cent of Koor Industries' shares.

The Shamrock Group, an investment firm controlled by the Disney family, told Hevrat Ha'ovdim earlier this month, it plans to exercise its option to purchase Koor's shares. The agreement in full will be signed in 30 days.

Garth Drabinsky: Corporate drama in three acts

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Garth Drabinsky was appalled that day in 1987 when he heard publishers were about to bid at auction for the rights to an unauthorized biography of himself.

Realizing that "a book filled with mistatements and misrepresentations and ignorant reporting of the facts would do me a lot of harm," he quickly took action by announcing plans to write his autobiography.

Nearly eight years later, McClelland & Stewart has published Closer To The Sun, in which the powerful Toronto-based entertainment mogul, dubbed "the Canadian Ziegfeld" by a New York writer, tells his own story in some 500 pages, frankly and compellingly, revealing much about himself in the process.

Drabinsky's career takes the shape of a high-powered corporate drama in three acts. Act One began when he teamed with Nat Taylor, his mentor, to build the 18-screen Cineplex in Toronto's Eaton Centre in the late '70s.

Over the next decade, he guided Cineplex Odeon through a meteoric rise to a publicly-traded corporation worth $1.3 billion. In 1989, he was ousted as CEO after a ruthless corporate battle which saw him pitted against the giant U.S. media conglomerate MCA.

In retrospect, he claims the deal that forced him out of Cineplex has proven disastrous for shareholders by reducing the company's worth to one-third of what it could have been worth had he remained.

Act Two. Rising from the ashes, Drabinsky established the immensely successful Livent (Live Entertainment of Canada Inc.) The company has produced a string of lucrative hits in Toronto and on Broadway, including the Tony-award-winning Kiss of The Spider Woman and Show Boat.

As well, Livent's productions of The Phantom of the Opera and other Andrew Lloyd Webber musicals (soon to include Sunset Boulevard) have grossed almost $700 million to date. Livent has bought the rights to E.L. Doctorow's novel Ragtime for development as a musical, and sold about 700,000 Show Boat original soundtrack albums.

And Act Three? Only the future can tell. At 45, Drabinsky is still a young man.

Like his book, written with Marq de Villiers, Garth Drabinsky in person is lively and engaging. He sits behind a large desk in an airy office decorated with portraits of himself, art by Jean Paul Riopelle and other artists, and a shelf on which his prized Tony and other awards sit.

> "A committed Zionist"

On the windowsill is a framed and signed photograph of him with Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres. Drabinsky calls himself a "committed Zionist" who visits Israel at least once a year. He has discussed bringing The Phantom of the Opera to Tel Aviv's new Opera House. ("I've urged Jerusalem to build a major theatrical facility, but they haven't yet ...")

He has also become a strongly vocal advocate of freedom of expression, after withstanding what he calls "an outrageous, anti-Semitic assault" from elements within Toronto's black community who unsuccessfully attempted to scuttle Livent's production of Show Boat, publicly condemning it as racist nearly two years before the production opened.

"They were clearly motivated for reasons of political empowerment, not for any rational grounds or any basis of history," he asserts.

"I was unwilling to compromise my fundamental rights and set a standard that would be detrimental to every other person who in future attempts to expound significant ideas of artistic expression."

(The production subsequently won rave reviews from the U.S. black press, as it did from the rest of the American media.)

Livent, Drabinsky says, remains concerned with works that deal with serious social issues, like Show Boat and Kiss of the Spider Woman. "Any new musicals that we do in future are going to have some pretty serious subject matters and issues. In the case of Ragtime, racism is still fundamental to that piece. I want to keep talking about racism because I find that it's so important."

Drabinsky also talks about Sweet Smell of Success, "which deals with political power and a world moving farther and farther to the right, finally resulting in the era of McCarthy. That's stuff that America is reliving again today. The parallelisms are there."

A generous supporter of nearly every Jewish charity that approaches him or his company, Drabinsky has lifelong ties to Toronto's Beth Sholom Synagogue.

However, he freely admits his disappointment that a respected Toronto rabbi condemned him from the pulpit during the Show Boat controversy. "When you're dealing with a man of intellect who runs scared and speaks without even seeing the production — and who refuses to see the production! — I think it says a lot about the state of affairs with the Jews of Toronto today.

"And I had to deal with other groups, largely in the Reform community, who showed the same fear, the same willingness to put their heads in the sand and take the position of the black minority against the Jews, for absolutely indefensible reasons."

Drabinsky is familiar with the role of underdog. Stricken with polio at age three, his childhood consisted of a series of grueling surgical procedures to regain the use of his paralysed left leg; the ordeal, he says, helped fuel his motivation for other challenges in life.

Known for his aggressive, ruthless and sometimes combative nature, he shrugs off criticism that he goes too far in defence of things dear to him.

"I never go beyond the boundaries of decency and integrity," he declares. "I fight aggressively for what I believe in and I make sure I'm not subject to inherent injustice or illegality.

"I've survived in a very tough business for 25 years — not only survived, but been able to establish a platform of respect on the international stage. WELL? That isn't easy to do. It's not a business for the weak of heart."

As for the future, Drabinsky says he intends to remain within the realm of live theatre; he decries the aura of "unscrupulousness" that surrounds Hollywood and many prime players in the movie industry.

"There's just a higher form of gentlemanly and moral conduct in the theatre business," he says. "The art form is, I think, the epitome of entertainment. I feel very comfortable in the milieu now. There's every likelihood that I'm going to stay in the live theatre part of the entertainment business."

Female cantors, a welcome addition to liturgical music

By PAULA CITRON
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Female cantors in recital were showcased recently by Holy Blossom Temple as part of Our Musical Heritage series.

The evening offered a clear example that the female voice, as exemplified by cantors Roslyn Barak and Faith Gurney, can be a welcome addition to the performance of Jewish liturgical music.

The concert also presented the newly formed Lachan Choir, whose performance under the direction of Holy Blossom Cantor Benjamin Maissner was of high professional calibre.

The Holy Blossom concert was not for traditionalists. The female voice sounds more operatic performing chazzanut than the male, and the female technique may lack some of the conventional cantorial ornamentation and embellishment, but it is a more delicate sound capable of haunting beauty.

Barak and Gurney brought to the liturgy an exquisite expressiveness of tone, color, nuance and emotion, much like an opera singer brings to an area. Both women are also superb actresses who transform their songs into stories.

The concert was made more interesting by the fact that the cantors are different vocal types, who bring different qualities to their singing. Barak is a lyric soprano whose deep rich bottom register puts her squarely in the dramatic camp. Gurney is a coloratura soprano whose feathery technique allows for impressive trills and a soft sweetness of sound.

Standouts in a concert full of riches were Barak's heart-felt moving performance of Song of Miriam, a lovely cantata by American composer Andrea Jill Higgins, and Gurney's beautifully reverential rendering of Pierre Pinchic's mystical Rozo d'Shabbos.

Maissner performed duets and trios with the women, their voices blending beautifully, particularly in Ana Halach Dodech, by Gil Al Dema, a setting of verse from the Song of Songs.

Maissner also acted as conductor as well as choir master for the evening.

The small instrumental ensemble, which included Nadya Adler (piano/organ), Barbara Ackerman (flute), Wendy Bornstein (oboe), David Miller (cello) and Julie Sager (harp), also deserves kudos for its sympathetic accompaniment in a very diverse repertoire.

Above all, Maissner and his guests should be applauded for the wonderful breadth of music selected, which included works by Canadian composers Ben Steinberg and Yefim Adler, along with a traditional and contemporary Hebrew, Yiddish and Sephardi repertoire.

Two new films from Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Alexander Abdulov and Bruria Albec in Coffee With Lemon.

It is a truism that some Soviet immigrants have not fared well in Israel. Coffee With Lemon, to be screened at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival on May 8 at 9:15 p.m., explores the travails of one such family.

Valery (Alexander Abdulov), a revered Moscow actor, immigrates to Israel with his wife and younger son. All their worldly possessions are packed into four suitcases.

Their home, a trailer on a bleak caravan site, perches on a hilltop in the desolate Judean Desert. They admire the view, but seem to be disappointed.

Thanks to a friend, Alexander lands an acting job upon arrival. But there's one insurmountable hitch — the play in which he is to appear is in Hebrew, a language he considers formidable. Frustration sets in as he tries to memorize his lines.

The long and short of it is that Alexander cannot cope with his new environment. Neither can his wife, who originally urged him to leave Moscow. Only their son likes Israel.

The situation goes from bad to worse as Alexander grows disillusioned with the theatre that employs him, embarks on a disquieting affair with his Hebrew tutor, Michal (Bruria Albec), and bitterly discovers that he is regarded as just "an immigrant" by Israelis.

Directed by Leonid Gorovetz, a Soviet newcomer himself, Coffee With Lemon derives its title from Alexander's addiction to drinking coffee with lemon juice.

Alexander's odd habit is a metaphor, really, for his inability to blend into Israeli society. Another recurring metaphor which also summarizes the difficulties Soviet immigrants encounter in Israel, turns on his neighbor's unsuccessful struggle to squeeze an oversized piano into his trailer.

On balance, Coffee With Lemon is a perceptive film about a family's attempt to adapt to Israel. Gorovetz doesn't pull his punches, but perhaps his vision is too unrelievedly dark.

The Flying Camel is a lighthearted Israeli comedy, albeit with serious undertones. It is slated to be shown on May 8 at 7:15 p.m.

Directed by Rami Na'aman, the movie is set in Tel Aviv and revolves around two eccentrics — Bauman (Gidon Zinger), a retired history professor with a passion for collecting Bauhaus artifacts, and Phares (Salim Dau), an Arab garbage collector bent on replanting his father's orange grove in Bauman's garden.

A third, rather extraneous character, Gina, is a lapsed Italian nun on a self-declared peace mission to Israel.

Though outwardly carefree and bubbly, The Flying Camel addresses two relevant issues. The first is the cultural gap between Arabs and Jews. The second is the Arab-Israeli dispute.

Ultimately, these troubling questions animate the film. The humor, which tends to be flat, is of secondary importance.

A study in character development

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Woman's Pale Blue Handwriting, based on a story by Franz Werfel, resonates with moral quandaries.

What should an upper-echelon Austrian civil servant do when he discovers that he has an illegitimate Jewish son?

The question is all the more urgent considering the fact that the year is 1936 and that a resurgent Germany is making threatening noises against Austria.

Due to be screened at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival on May 9 at 7:15 p.m., Axel Corti's thought-provoking movie unfolds against the backdrop of class snobbery, moral appeasement and anti-Semitism.

The central character, Leonidas Tachezy (Friedrich von Thun), a senior official in the Ministry of Education and Culture, was a "perfect nobody" until he wed Amelia (Krystyna Janda), the heiress to a fortune. As a result of her family connections, Tachezy rose quickly in the ranks.

One day, Tachezy receives a letter from Vera Wormser (Fredrika Kammer), a former lover, which throws him into an abyss of fear. Wormser, a German Jew with whom he had an adulterous affair, suddenly requires his assistance.

At first, Tachezy fears he will lose his job and his position in society if it is revealed that he is the father of her child.

But out of wilful pride, the normally calculating Tachezy decides to take a stand. At a meeting with the anti-Semitic minister of education, Tachezy disputes his reasoning that a renowned Jewish scholar should not be given an important university appointment.

By voicing dissent, Tachezy upsets the minister and his smug colleagues and, furthermore, jeopardizes his own career.

Corti's film is not only a skillful study in character development. It is an expose of political accommodation and compromise, the kind that can strip a nation of its dignity and plunge it into ruin.

Woman's Pale Blue Handwriting, distinguished by fine acting and good pacing, is a film well worth seeing.

Surrender!

Love, piety, tradition and oppression are the universal themes which course through Edward Sloman's 1927 silent film, Surrender!

Scheduled to be screened on May 10 at 5:30 p.m., this dusty, almost forgotten gem touches the emotions.

It gathers its strength from a romance foisted upon a lovely, betrothed Jewish woman by a Russian army officer and prince.

Constantin, the Russian, feasts his eyes on Lea, the rabbi's daughter, and falls madly in love with her. She resists his advances.

The place: a shtetl on the the Austro-Hungarian-Russian border. The time: on the eve of World War I.

The scene shifts to the outbreak of the war. A Russian Cossack force, commanded by Constantin, occupies the town. In his quest to find Lea, Constantin invites himself to the rabbi's house, where he finds the object of his desire hidden behind a Torah ark.

Constantin threatens to shoot Lea's fiance unless she kisses him, the Russian. Rebuffed, he then threatens to burn down the town, with all its Jewish inhabitants, unless Lea appears at his room at a certain time.

The rabbi faces a terrible dilemma. Should he allow Lea to sacrifice herself, like the biblical Esther, or remain pure and unsullied?

The drama mounts as the hour of doom approaches. Surrender! never flags as the climax nears.

The film ends with a twist, suggesting that true romance conquers all.

Books

By Bernard Baskin

Beyond The Promised Land, by Glen Frankel (Simon & Schuster, $31).

This book is a superb summary of recent Israeli history by a Pulitzer Prize-winning journalist who served as Jerusalem Bureau Chief for the Washington Post from 1986 to 1989.

It reviews events that challenged Israel during the seven-year period (1987-1993): the intifadah, the Persian Gulf War, the huge influx of Soviet Jews, the confrontation between President George Bush and Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir, the victory of the Labor Party in 1992 and the momentous Israeli-Palestinian peace accord.

Frankel illustrates how Israel is being transformed from a collectivist garrison-state under siege, to a more open, pluralistic, increasingly capitalistic and democratic country.

With consummate skill, precision and clarity, the author depicts the shifting and complex nature of Israeli political life, the demands of the religious groups, the Ashkenazi-Sephardi cleavage, the influence of the Russian immigrants, the struggle for position and power within the many parties, and the growing importance of the hi-tech sector. For the first time since 1948, maintains the author, Israel is strong and confident enough to create history — as opposed to merely being defined by it — and thus to make peace with its enemies.

The Gulf War was a defining moment for the country. It tested Israelis — their army, their government, their leaders and themselves — in ways they had never been tested before.

"It demanded thoughtfulness, restraint and maturity rather than strength, speed and daring. It forced some Israelis to choose between the personal safety of themselves and their families and their obligations to the state. Israel entered the Gulf crisis as one country; it came out the other end of the tunnel as someplace else."

In 1988, the Labor Party bargained with three ultra-Orthodox parties and agreed to amend the Law of Return which would give the rabbinate sole power to decide who among the immigrants qualified as a Jew.

The explosion of outrage from Diaspora Jews astounded the Israeli politicians. As an influential businessman from Miami put it, "Don't you people have enough problems without angering your only real allies in the world?"

The amendment was dropped but the issue damaged Israeli standing among Diaspora Jews. "Americans who always assumed that Israelis practised the same degree of religious freedom and pluralism that they themselves enjoyed in the United States were stunned to find out that the Orthodox rabbinate wielded a state-funded monopoly over Jewish practice and religious education, and was prepared to attack and defame anyone who threatened its power."

The collapse of the kibbutz as an Israeli symbol of dedication and idealism marks the transition from the old centralized economy to a slowly emerging free market. "For many Jews it was the real story of Israel, a change more profound and irreversible than anything that happened in the battlefield or in the polling booth."

The massacre of Palestinians by Baruch Goldstein sharpened the eagerness of mainstream Israelis to separate themselves from the West Bank and Gaza ... and, if necessary, from the settlers who insisted on remaining there. Many Israelis, rightists and leftists alike, were appalled to discover the amount of support Goldstein's deed commanded, especially among young Israelis.

This perceptive, polished and thorough overview of the "New Israel" is illuminating and hopeful. It must be among the best of recent guidebooks to Israel's recent past and uncertain future.

Neo-Nazism highlighted

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Without Me, slated for May 7 at 8 p.m., is a wry semi-autobiographical short about the rise of neo-Nazi violence in unified Germany.

Simon Rosenthal (Dani Levy), a timid Jewish filmmaker living in Berlin, feels victimized by the xenophobic climate. His self-pity and cowering have already alienated his German girlfriend (Maria Schrader).

How can he regain her respect? Should he be defiant? Should he, as his mother suggests, leave Germany? Should he be proud of his Jewishness?

The manner in which Rosenthal addresses these challenges forms the core of Levy's biting film.

Wry and pungent

Wry and pungent, Black Rider, to be screened on May 7 at 1:45 p.m., is an Academy Award winning short on the surprising pitfalls of racism.

Crosstown Sabbath, on May 7 at about 2 p.m., alternates between a shtetl in Slovakia and New York City. A contemplative piece about the stress of modern urban existence, it unfolds through such metaphors as a factory, a hunter, Nazi stormtroopers, the Holocaust and carpet-bombing airplanes.

Balagan, on May 9 at 9:15 p.m., challenges the usual assumptions about the Holocaust and Israeli society. By turns quirky and shocking, this Israeli documentary is anything but conventional.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

One evening in May 1933, some 4½ months after Hitler became chancellor of Germany, there occurred in Berlin a scene the likes of which, according to historian William L. Shirer, "had not been witnessed in the Western world since the late Middle Ages." German university students were fueling huge bonfires with the books of enemies of the Reich such as Lion Feuchtwanger, Jakob Wassermann, Arnold and Stefan Zweig, Albert Einstein — and Thomas Mann, the German-born Nobel laureate and one of the towering figures of 20th-century literature.

Two months earlier, Mann and his wife had left their Munich home for a trip to France and Switzerland; while away, they decided not to return. He was deeply involved in composing the second volume of a major four-volume literary project begun in 1928 and not complete until 1944.

At a time when Germans were zealously banding together to throw the Jews into a deep pit, Mann was laboring under a different impulse: to elevate the Jews, along with the ancient myths and ethos that they represented, to a high literary pedestal through a grand retelling of the biblical story of Joseph.

Thomas Mann: One of the towering figures of modern literature.

Mann's self-imposed exile necessitated an unwelcome interruption of many months to his master work, Joseph And His Brothers. "A courageous child who had ventured to return to our confiscated house in Munich brought me the manuscript from there to southern France," he would later explain.

As his published diaries reveal, Mann seemed to recognize the true nature of the National Socialism movement from the start. In his private writings he never characterized the Nazis as anything other than ugly and aberrant. "People would have laughed in disbelief at anyone in the 19th century who [might have] predicted such a relapse," he wrote. He saw his fellow Germans as "a wretched, isolated, demented people, misled by a wild, stupid band of adventurers whom they take for mythical heroes. The entire National Socialist 'movement,' including its instigator, is a prime example of the German spirit's wallowing in the manure of myth. With its fraudulent, timeworn pretension to be a 'return,' this movement offers a real feast to the Germans' hatred to truth, their lust for everything misty and vaporous."

In 1933, Mann described Hitler as "a typical product of the lower middle class, with a limited education and an acquired taste for philosophizing. ... The ideas he presents, haplessly and in a truly pathetic style, constantly repeating himself and making dreadful solecisms, are those of a hard-working but hopelessly limited grade-school pupil. They might be touching if they were not so frighteningly presumptuous."

Mann was mistaken only in assuming the anti-Jewish atrocities provoked by "this idiot Hitler" would subside in the face of indignant protests from outside. "When will the League of Nations begin to deal with this absurd criminality?" he wondered in 1935 after hearing from a colleague of the continued pressures to which the Jews in Germany were subject.

In 1936 he finished Joseph In Egypt, the third novel in the quartet. He also broke his public silence on Germany's treatment of her Jews. The German government responded by revoking his citizenship. "The blindness of these people is monstrous," he lamented in another of his recurrent journal entries on the disastrous step backwards that Germany had taken. He started and finished the fourth novel of the tetralogy, Joseph the Provider, after emigrating to America in 1938.

Regarded as a masterpiece of biblical fiction, Joseph And His Brothers seems to possess a deep, almost midrashic understanding. Not surprisingly, its author sought rabbinical opinions. For example, he wrote to Rabbi Jakob Horovitz of Frankfurt on such matters as the following: "Joseph must have used another name in Egypt, or at any rate distorted his own into an almost unrecognizable Egyptian form. For it will take some juggling to explain the fact that old Jacob in Hebron should hear nothing about the life and glorious rise of his son down there."

The Encyclopedia Judaica calls Joseph And His Brothers "the most profound treatment of this biblical theme in literature." In this season of Holocaust anniversaries, it is fitting that we remember those who sought to elevate the Jewish nation as well as those who were obsessed with its destruction.

Yom Hashoah

Fifty Years

Remembering the Holocaust by Aba Bayefsky

The Canadian Jewish news

'We are here'

Yom Hashoah: 50 Years Later is not so much a subject about which we write, as it is a consecration of love which we try to honor.

Three months ago, in marking the 50th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz, we wrote that our ability to understand what Auschwitz, what liberation, what survival truly meant was diminished, inherently limited, by our codes of ordinary human behavior.

"Somewhere in the unarticulated silences of our minds, in the dark untravelled spaces of imagination, in a survivor's unaverted glance, or in the tearful, heartbreaking detail of an old, perhaps frayed, black and white photograph, we will find the meaning of Auschwitz. But those are places we, the next generation, and all generations hereafter cannot truly visit. And it is a meaning we will never fully grasp. That is why anniversaries are important. They take us to the edge of where our minds, our hearts and our souls can travel, but no further."

This anniversary, in particular, is significant. It is melancholy and urgent. The number portends the closing of a circle. Fifty years – one half century – have passed. And yet, to the survivors, those years must seem as yesterday, a recurring, frightful nightmare which they can never escape. Their children are already parents, raising children of their own.

"This anniversary... is melancholy and urgent"

Editorial

Every effort to commemorate the anniversary will ultimately be inadequate. But not for the sake of its adequacy do we make the attempt. Rather, we do so for the sake of the sanctity of human life and for the sake of the love of children for their parents.

This commemorative supplement contains three elements: the artwork of Aba Bayefsky, two essays - one interpretative, the other an eye-witness account of "liberation", and a series of brief sketches of the experiences of nine survivors.

Aba Bayefsky was an official War Artist with the RCAF, when the British army liberated Bergen-Belsen. He made his way to the camp soon after the British did. What he saw and what he smelled permanently seared his soul, guiding his hand and making perfectly clear the vision in his mind's eye. The painting on the cover of the supplement, a rendering of the angel of death wielding his murderous scythe through a harvest of human devastation, has never been seen by the public. It is called Remembering the Holocaust. We have used Bayefsky's art as a signature throughout the supplement. We have also reproduced a photograph of the camp, which he personally took. Where words fall short, Bayefsky's art reaches the centre.

Alain Goldschlager reflects on the absurdity of the term "liberation" as it applies to anyone who was in the camps. Rabbi Gunther Plaut recalls what it was like when he entered the camp at Nordhausen as a chaplain in the 104th infantry division of the U.S. army.

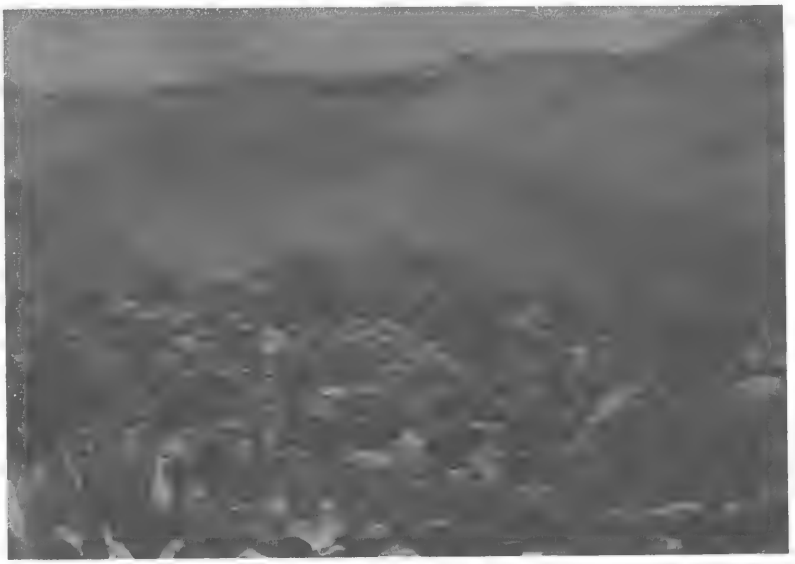
We have also collected very brief descriptions of the experiences of nine survivors. They are bare distillates of unbelievable stories. The task of recording and transmitting these experiences in so small a written space was impossible. But we deemed it essential. We commend our reporters, Elaine Cohen in Montreal and Cynthia Gasner in Toronto, who met with the survivors and recorded their stories.

Each is different; and yet each is the same. The heart of their experience is inaccessible. It cannot be transmitted.

As any child of a survivor knows, sometimes we would need only glance at him and we would know. He sat nearby, immersed in his work, but at a remove of time and place far in the past, distracted, eyes red-rimmed, remembering and unreachable.

Was he touching them? Was he laughing with them? Was he being a brother or a son, a nephew or a cousin? Was he apologizing for having survived? Or was he simply saying good-bye to them? For he never had the chance.

We, the next generation, owe so much to you. Your love, as fierce as a lion's claw, has protected us. As gentle as a sparrow's breath, it has sustained us. But the debt can only be repaid with the promise of goodness, of continued Jewish life and the forging of an unbroken chain. In a poor echo of the Jewish partisan's rallying cry, we therefore say to you: "We are here."



The remains of life cast into the pit, Bergen-Belsen, April 1945, as photographed by Aba Bayefsky

The Jewish Partisan Song
by Hirsh Glick

Never say that there is only death for you
Though leaden skies may be concealing days of blue
Because the hour we have hungered for is near;
Beneath our steps the earth shall tremble: We are here.

From land of palm-tree to the far-off land of snow,
We shall be coming with our torment and our woe,
And everywhere our blood has sunk into the earth
Shall our bravery and our courage blossom forth.

We'll have the morning sun to set our day aglow,
And all our yesterdays shall vanish with the foe,
And if the time is long before the sun appears,
Then let this song go like a signal through the years.

This song was written with our blood and not with lead;
It's not song that summer birds sing overhead,
It was a people, among toppling barricades,
That sang this song of ours with pistols and grenades.

So never say that there is only death for you.
Leaden skies may be concealing days of blue,
Yet the hour we have hungered for is near;
Beneath our steps the earth shall tremble: We are here!

Yom Hashoah: Fifty Years

SURVIVAL

Determination, courage, and random luck. These were the essential elements of survival. We record the stories of nine survivors: how they remained alive and where their lives have led them.

Walter and Lisel Absil as youngsters in war-torn Europe.

'I was one of the lucky ones.'

Walter Absil:

He refers to himself as the Indiana Jones of the Holocaust.

Walter Absil, a 71-year-old Holocaust survivor, was arrested by the Germans, escaped bombings and darted over Europe avoiding Nazis.

Born in Vienna, the family fled to Brussels in 1938. In 1940 and again in 1942, Walter, his sister Lisel, and their parents sought refuge in numerous hideouts. One day, the children returned home to find their parents had been deported to Auschwitz, where they died. That night, the resourceful teenager smuggled his sister into a convent in Waterloo.

Through the Belgian underground, he escaped to a farm near the French border. The Jewish city boy made himself useful milking cows until 1944.

"For me liberation day was Sept. 3, 1944, not April 15, 1945," Absil reflects with a glint in his eye. "I was riding a bike in the middle of the forest, when I spotted a jeep with American soldiers. They approached me asking if I'd seen any soldiers. I knew it was over."Married in 1945, Absil left Belgium in 1951. "One of the reasons I settled in Montreal is because I didn't have enough money to continue and the other was the language factor," says Absil, who is fluent in French.

The retired businessman shuns compliments for bravery. "There was no alternative. Besides, I was one of the lucky ones."A father of three and grandfather of six, he talks freely of his war-time experiences. Moreover, he takes pride in the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre, where family documents and photographs are prominently displayed.

Absil's sister is a Carmelite nun. Despite different lifestyles, brother and sister maintain close ties. Recently, she visited Montreal to attend his grandchild's wedding.

'I only feel liberated during the day. I'm still there at night.'

Avrum Feigenbaum:

Avrum Feigenbaum, a survivor of Auschwitz, was 26 in 1945. He remembers the Germans coming to the gates of the Gorlitz Gross-Rosen work camp in Silesia on May 8, 1945.

"We didn't believe them when they told us we were free," he says. "We thought it was another trick until the next day, when the Russians came to the gates." Feigenbaum's neglected wounds received medical attention on May 10. From the hospital, he joined his brother and friends in Lodz.

Feigenbaum dislikes the term liberation. "We aren't here to celebrate our victory. The allies had a victory, not us. If I have to mark a day for my liberation it's June 8, 1950, when I arrived in Montreal. And I only feel liberated during the day. I'm still there at night." He credits his wife Tema with helping him get through the nights.

Childhood friends in Lodz, Avrum and Tema were separated during the war, reunited in 1945 and married in 1946. Feigenbaum says his 39-year-old son, Israel, is aware of his parents' war-time experiences.

Feigenbaum tried to rebuild a Jewish community in Lodz after the war but by 1948, communism was established and he had to escape. The Jewish Labour Committee in New York secured a clandestine route via Germany and Sweden to Montreal.

The Feigenbaum family arrived in Montreal with $85 and no luggage. That was a Friday night in 1950. By Monday morning, the cabinetmaker was reporting for work and taking night classes to learn English.

Even in the ghetto, Feigenbaum's carpentry earned him a privileged position making furniture for German dignitaries. When sent to Auschwitz, Feigenbaum and 900 others were put on sale and bought by Gorlitz Gross-Rosen, where they labored on armored vehicles for the army.

Feigenbaum and his two brothers were the last ones taken from the Lodz ghetto to Auschwitz. Weakened from a vicious beating, one of his brothers died. His parents and a sister perished in Auschwitz.

According to Feigenbaum, a good sense of humor kept him going throughout those rough years. It's ironic, he points out, because Lodz was the home of a famous satirical theatre before the war.

Judy Berlach's family in 1938.

'Everybody ran out when the Americans arrived...'

Judy Winkler Berlach:

Judy Berlach may not know how to beat the common cold but she'll never forget the liberation day potion that cured her fever.

"Everybody ran out when the Americans arrived in Salzwedel but my fever was so high, I couldn't walk," Berlach relates. "When my friends returned they put some rum in my tea and I slept for two days. When I woke up my fever was gone."

Born in Hungary, Berlach was 10 when the war broke out. In July 1944, she was taken to Birkenau, where she vividly recalls the selection process.

"On one side there were crematoria, where my younger sisters and brothers went with my mother," she says. Her father had been arrested earlier.

Berlach, whose maiden name is Winkler, came from a family of 15 children. Seven survived. She was 15 when she arrived at Auschwitz and shared a barrack with hundreds of teenage girls. Later, she was "selected" and sent to Germany.

After liberation, Berlach was brought to a DP (Displaced Persons) camp in Germany. She didn't know the whereabouts of her siblings. Fortunately, a brother found her and she was reunited with the survivors.

Berlach married in Germany and moved to Holland with her late husband. They immigrated to Montreal with a 6-month-old child. Now she has two grown daughters.

Although Berlach made a new life in Canada, she says the horror of the Holocaust will remain with her forever. It meant "the loss of family and loss of youth," she says.

A secular Jew, she believes in tradition. "The first seder has special meaning this year because it marks the 50th year of the day I was liberated."

Yom Hashoah: Fifty Years

Committing history to canvas

The images of Bergen-Belsen were fixed in his mind and remain with him to this day

Holocaust deniers cannot deny the history recorded by international artist and art jurist, Aba Bayefsky, who stood at Bergen Belsen shortly after the British overran the concentration camp in April 1945.

As an official War Artist with the Royal Canadian Air Force's 39th Reconnaissance Wing stationed near Lunenberg, Germany, Bayefsky, then 22 years old, recalls that he was faced with the stench of death that had settled over the entire area.

"I have, over the years, produced a large body of work which has its genesis in the Holocaust..."

"The truck loads of dead inmates were being placed into newly dug pits by captured German soldiers and German civilians who were denying any previous knowledge or connection with the death camp," he told The CJN. The impressions and images of Bergen-Belsen were fixed in his mind and remain with him to this day.

After liberation, Bayefsky filled his sketch books with the unbelievable scenes he had witnessed. Now, 50 years later, this traumatic experience has remained the cornerstone of his work.

"I have, over the years, produced a large body of work which has its genesis in the Holocaust – drawings, paintings and graphics." Sadly, he adds, many of these have not been seen by the public. He explains that private collectors and public galleries prefer not to make statements based on moral intensity.

"We know that there is a concerted effort to rewrite the history of the Holocaust – by reinterpreting what transpired in these death camps – by building Catholic churches and shrines close to Dachau in order to de-emphasize the Jewish victims in this extermination camp."

Canadian artists, he says, believe that art should not intrude in areas of serious matters of conscience. This is not the practice in Europe, America and elsewhere. "Art and social comment go hand in hand. As examples, Goya dealing with the Inquisition and Picasso's most famous painting of the Spanish Civil War called Guernica. Important artists have never hesitated to make their feelings known."

Born in Toronto, he says that from early childhood, he wanted to be an artist. He attended Central Technical School and the Academy Julian in Paris. Soon after the outbreak of war, at 18, he joined the RCAF and became the youngest official War Artist in the Canadian Armed Forces.

In 1944, he won a world-wide art competition for Air Force personnel. Winning a French government scholarship in 1947, he was able to return to Europe where he pursued his theme of people affected by the war. He created a series of drawings and paintings of displaced persons and their lives in the DP camps.

Over the years, people have remained his major subject matter whether he is painting, drawing, and in his murals and his publications. He has won numerous awards for his work including the Order of Canada in 1979.

He presented one-man exhibitions at the Canadian Consulate in Washington, New York and Chicago. He is the first faculty member of the Ontario College of Art to have a one-man exhibition in the College. In the 50s and 60s, he created a series of Canadian themes and legends.

In 1978, he completed a portfolio of lithographs titled Tales from the Talmud which was presented to Menachem Begin by Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau on behalf of the Canadian people to commemorate the Israeli prime minister's visit to Canada. In 1989, an outstanding retrospective exhibition of his work was presented at the Koffler Gallery.

Among his 48 one-man exhibitions is Bayefsky's Toronto, a Celebration of the city and its people. When President Tito of Yugoslavia visited Ottawa, he was presented with Bayefsky's Portfolio of Earth and Sky, a gift reflecting the true spirit of Canada.

Bayefsky is represented in collections in major galleries. For more than half a century, the prolific artist has, and continues to produce world-acclaimed works reflecting the realistic world of life around him.

Other subjects which are favourites of his include the Kensington Market and portrait studies. He was catapulted into world fame when he was joined by Barker Farley in a painting of Scottish poet, Hugh MacDiarmid, which was issued in Scotland as a stamp to commemorate the poet's 80th birthday.

His mural honoring the slain Israeli athletes murdered at the 1972 Olympics in Munich can be seen in the lobby of the Jewish Community Centre on Spadina Ave.

"One would think that after such a catastrophic occurrence, anti-Semitism would have disappeared..."

Bayefsky says that half a century after entering Bergen-Belsen, his thoughts and feelings energize him to think about what anti-Semitism has done over the years. "One would think that after such a catastrophic occurrence, anti-Semitism would have disappeared. Instead, we have a regeneration of the animosities that the Jewish people have had to deal with throughout our history."

Yom Hashoah: Fifty Years

The day that changed my life

"I saw a sight that I won't forget as long as I live"

By RABBI GUNTHER PLAUT

The date was April 12, 1945 – so long ago, and yet like yesterday. Jewish history is like that: it deals with the past and transposes it into the present. it was the day that changed my life.

I was the Jewish chaplain of the 104th Infantry Division, First Army of the U.S. Some weeks before, we had taken Cologne and from there had moved on to Bonn, where, in the morgue of the university, we had begun our seder. But no sooner had we started than we were ordered to move on. It was the middle of the night, as on the first Pesach night ever, only this time we did not have to cross the Reed Sea; this time we crossed the Rhine, dry-shod like our ancestors. This time, however, we were not bound for the revelation at Sinai; our revelation would be of another kind.

It was the middle of the night, as on the first Pesach night ever...

We thought we knew all about liberation. We had already freed part of the Reich from the oppressor. We had met numbers of former concentration camp inmates and heard their harrowing tales. We had seen their emaciated bodies, their empty eyes buried deep in their skulls, and we tried to bring them back to life. But none of these encounters could prepare us for what was to come. We had reached the little city of Nordhausen. Nearby, buried in the belly of the Harz mountains, were the military installations upon which Hitler had placed his last hope.

Here the rumbling, V-1 mammoth bombs were being manufactured, and here the first jet-propelled V-2 missiles were constructed. I had experienced their impact in London, on the way over, and the frightful scream they emitted on their descent rang in my ears for a long while.

On April 12, we came upon Dora, the place where the labor force was housed. They were KZ inmates who slaved below the earth, far from the day's light. Fed minimum rations, they worked, starved and died, only to be replaced by newcomers. The living were housed in the camps ovens. The secrets of the V-2 were safe with the dead.

Later that night I wrote my daily letter to my wife.

This afternoon I saw a sight that I won't forget as long as I live, concentration camp for Jews, Russians, Poles, and political unreliables. When our troops arrived there about 4,000 dead lying around and 400 scarcely alive – if alive they could be called. Death for the others had come mostly through starvation, a fearful sight indeed. Our troops were out in numbers staring at the incredible scene. There were many who for the first time in their lives were convinced – because they couldn't help seeing what they saw – that what they had heard about the Germans wasn't all propaganda.

In the scale of camps it was a "minor" installation, except for those who perished there. For me, it produced a shock of major proportions, for the reality was far more ghastly than I had imagined. Dora-Nordhausen breached my protective shell against death and dying as nothing else had done, and I was confronted with a spiritual crisis which it took some time to resolve.

Gen. Terry Allen put me in charge of the burial. I summoned the mayor of Nordhausen. He arrived with his wife and some burghers, all in their Sunday-best. They protested that they had no idea what had gone on here; that they could not help themselves; that none of them was a Nazi; and that they loved the Jews (there had been a flourishing community in Nordhausen, going back to the thirteenth century).

I was not impressed and ordered them to appear in force the next morning, to wash the bodies (many of them already decomposed) and bury them properly.

"Your request is inhuman," said the mayor. That remark did it for me, and I became more furious than I thought was possible. I had one succinct answer: Unless they liked to see their own houses burned to the ground they would begin their work at sunrise and finish it, if possible, in one day. The next morning about five hundred or more burghers were present. I don't remember how long it took, but of one thing I was certain: they too would remember this day.

Meanwhile we fed the living, took note of the contacts they remembered and assured them that our occupation troops would arrive soon and look to their needs. There was a small infirmary, where we put the sickest of the survivors.

Amongst them was one Lili Mayer, a young woman in years and aged in experience. I did not know her then, for her story became public only some years later. She had been unconscious, near death from typhus, a mere shadow of a human being. When she regained consciousness and began to adjust to her surroundings, she saw an album on the little table next to her bed. It contained pictures, evidently taken by a German photographer who had fled when we came and left them behind. They were snapshots taken in Auschwitz, during Mengele's selection process. She flipped through the pages – and suddenly saw a picture of herself and her family as they came off the train (she did not know then that all of them had been gassed).

They protested that they had no idea what had gone on here.

Years later, we had a reunion in Miami, where she lived with her husband and family. The album is now at Yad Vashem in Jerusalem.

Our division moved on shortly thereafter. But one man's plea still rings in my ears. "My name is Cohn, Abraham Cohn," he cried, "I have a brother in America. Brooklyn or somewhere. You must find him and tell him I'm still alive. You must find him, you must... Cohn, remember, Cohn, Cohn!"

I knew then that our task would not be finished for a long time, if ever.

We waged in many languages the same hard, relentless struggle, a struggle which claimed many victims, and which has not yet ended.
The complete eradication of Nazism is our watchword.
The building of a new world of peace and freedom is our aim.
This we owe to our murdered comrades, and their families.

Yom Hashoah: Fifty Years

Cattle car enroute from Austria to Italy in 1945. Zoltak (left) in short pants.

'We found very few remaining Jews... 70 survivors out of 7,500'

Sidney Zoltak:

The memories of anti-Semitism haven't dimmed but Sidney Zoltak is no longer opposed to visiting his birthplace. Perhaps it is the softening on the part of the Polish shepherd who housed him during the war.

For years, the shepherd refused to allow Zoltak's mother to include the family surname on the return address in correspondence. It was too Jewish and he would be castigated by his neighbors, he felt. So Mrs. Zoltak assumed another surname.

"Now he isn't as concerned," Zoltak says, "and he even offered to come to Warsaw to pick me up."

Zoltak was born in Semiatych, a town in eastern Poland. He was 13 in 1944, when he was liberated by the Red Army.

"There were seven of us in the Fifth Underground, a hiding place on a farm, when we heard Russian spoken through a peep hole. We ran out. At the time, I was barefooted, undernourished and fell after a kilometre."

Zoltak's parents were with him. The Russian soldiers drove them into Semiatych. "We found very few remaining Jews, approximately 70 survivors out of 7,500," Zoltak says.

In 1942, his parents, relatives and another family with their children were crammed into one house. Thus began two years of running. "The last place we were at for a little over a year. We came upon a shepherd and his sister outside of a forest. He took a liking to my father's watch and was promised it for helping us, so he took us in. We had five different hiding places and many close calls."

Outings were limited to evenings. "Liberation marked the first time we were out during the day and so I remember the blinding sunlight," says Zoltak, adding at night the sky lit up with artillery fire.

Zoltak regards liberation as a disappointment. "It's not a celebration, more of a realization of the enormity of our tragedy. Instead of embracing us, feeling sorry for us and extending sympathy, we were made to feel unwanted when we returned to Poland. Many of the survivors that were killed in Poland after liberation were not killed by Germans but by the Polish," Zoltak says.

As chairman of the Yom Hashoah commemoration, he encourages continuity and commemoration. "We must leave a proper legacy to the next generation," says Zoltak, an insurance broker, who works with his son Joseph.

The pain of her loss overshadowed the joy of her survival

Gerda Frieberg:

On May 8, 1945, the Soviet Army liberated the Oberaltstadt Concentration Camp in Czechoslovakia. While the world celebrated the end of the war, for Gerda (Steinitz) Frieberg and many other survivors, she says, there was no cause for celebration.

She was alive, she was free, she felt that she had a lot to live for but the pain of her loss overshadowed the joy of her survival.

With her mother and her sister, Frieberg began searching for other family members and friends. Each day their hopes dwindled and when they reached their home town in Bielszowitz, they realized that, of the 172 in their extended family, they were the only survivors.

Frieberg says she knew she did not belong there.

From Upper Silesia on the German-Polish border where she was raised, the Jews were deported to the Jaworzno ghetto in March 1940. The males were liquidated in 1941 and the women were removed in 1942. Frieberg was taken to Oberaltstadt where she did heavy men's work in a machine shop.

After liberation, she began her odyssey in search of a place where she could rebuild her life.

She joined a small group of survivors who set out for Palestine. They crossed four borders and arrived in Bratislava illegally, only to discover that they could not get to Turkey where they could leave for Palestine.

They retraced their steps and in Germany, they were put in a DP camp at Landsberg near Munich.

For four years Frieberg searched for a country that would accept her. In 1949, she went to Israel, but she says she was looking for a country where her children could live without the threat of war.

Married in Israel and with a six-week-old baby, the family left for Canada in 1953, where she began rebuilding her life.

While raising her two children and becoming actively involved in building a family business, she made a commitment, although she says it was not popular at the time, that after she learned English, she would devote her life to speaking about the Holocaust and carry the message of remembrance.

It was this determination that led to the creation of the Holocaust Memorial Centre in Toronto, where she served as the founding chair.

She says she is pleased today, that more than 12,000 students visit the centre annually. And she is proud of her daughter and her son, who is president of Toronto's Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, and of her six grandchildren.

She recently completed her term as chair of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region and she has received many awards.

She says that her raison d'etre has been to devote her life to making sure the world never forgets.

"This is my way of dealing with my haunting memories."

Gerda Frieberg

The nightmares never end

Anita Ekstein:

The war did not end for Anita (Helfgott) Ekstein on the day of liberation.

A hidden child living as a Polish Catholic, she could not admit that she was Jewish. As an only child whose parents had been killed, she says she had nowhere else to go.

Born in Lwow, she was only 5 when the Russians occupied Eastern Poland in 1939. The Germans came in 1941 and the Jews were taken to a ghetto. Shortly after, while looking for food for the family, her mother was picked up, taken away and never seen again.

Realizing the plight of the Jews in the ghetto, a Polish Catholic who worked with her father offered to help.

Ekstein recalls the day the man came to the ghetto, put her in a sack and carried her over his shoulder to his home in Rozdol. Her name was changed to Anna Jaworska, a false birth certificate was issued and she took lessons in Catholicism.

Living as the man's orphaned niece, she was betrayed by Polish neighbors, but when the Nazis came for her, the daughter of the house threw her out of a window into a snowbank and she was taken back to her father in the ghetto. While her father worked, she says she hid in a wardrobe all day.

Again the Polish friend came for her, this time taking her to the home of his nephew, a Catholic priest.

She remained with the priest until the Russians liberated the town in 1944. But there was no rejoicing, she says. Not one other Jew there had survived.

She returned to the priest's uncle, feeling isolated. She was told not to admit she was Jewish; in her mind, to do so meant death. Soon after liberation, she learned her father had been shot and she became reconciled to her orphaned Catholic life.

Though Ekstein did not know it, her father had left some addresses with his Polish friend. Although her guardian wished to have her remain as his niece, he wrote to her mother's sister in New York.

She contacted another aunt, one of

Anita Ekstein

Schindler's Jews who had survived, and to Ekstein's surprise, she says, her aunt arrived one day to take her niece away.

Only then, in April of 1946, did the war end for Ekstein. She could now admit she was Jewish and take her own name again. She says she was totally mixed up and recalls running to the church from time to time and her aunt would come to bring her home.

Unable to enter Canada or the United States, Ekstein and her aunt lived in Paris for two years. In 1948, they were sponsored by a Canadian friend of her American aunt. At 14, without a word of English, she was put into Grade 8 and began rebuilding her life.

The mother of three children and seven grandchildren, Ekstein graduated with a bachelor's degree in psychology in 1985.

She says she has dedicated her life to the memory of those who did not survive. She served as chair of the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto and often speaks to students in Holocaust education programs. She chairs the Child Survivor -- Hidden Children of Toronto organization.

Despite the fact that she appears calm, Ekstein says the nightmares never end. Being chased and hiding permeate her thoughts. "I think of the horrors of my parents' deaths more and more as I get older — it haunts me."

She adds that for many years she could not talk about this part of her life, but, "To talk about it has made me a healthier person."

Yom Hashoah: Fifty Years

When the partisans attacked, she escaped and joined them

Faye Schulman today and (inset) 16-year-old Faye Schulman during the Russian occupation.

Faye Schulman:

On the day of liberation, Faye (Lazebnik) Schulman felt sick.

She had survived and had food, clothing and the necessities of life, and could look back with a sense of pride on her work with the partisans.

But she says she was devastated by the memories of those who fought with her and died, and shattered because she thought she had lost her parents, two sisters and four brothers.

She was a teenager studying photography and art when the Russians took over her town in the province of Pinsk in Poland in 1939. In 1941, the Nazis occupied the area. Shortly after that, all men 14 to 45 were taken away to a work camp in Gancewich, including two of her brothers.

A ghetto was created and Schulman went to work as a photographer for the occupying Nazi government. She was allowed to work with her photographic equipment in her family home. With the freedom this gave her to leave the ghetto, she would bring back food for her family and for others.

One of her assignments, before the trenches were dug and the liquidation began, was to photograph the SS chief.

On the day of the final liquidation, Schulman says, "Someone told me to run and find the chief of the SS."

He had her taken away at rifle point and she was led to the synagogue, where she joined five other families, the only 27 survivors in the town.

She watched as all 1,850 in the ghetto were marched to the trenches, including her family. The shots and cries of the victims still remain in her mind, she says, and even today, she is traumatized by the noise of shouting crowds.

Shortly after the liquidation of the ghetto, the partisans attacked. She escaped and joined them. Though she had no training, she worked as a nurse and performed surgery when a doctor was not available. She also volunteered for every partisan attack and ambush.

After liberation by the Russians, she discovered that her two brothers had not perished. They had escaped from the work camp and joined the partisans. The three were reunited in a DP (displaced persons) camp. There she also met a young survivor whom she married.

Returning to her town, she found that where there had been 45,000 Jews, none remained. "It felt like a cemetery," she says.

The young couple went to a DP camp in Landsberg, Germany, where she joined a group of former partisans who traded much of their food for rifles, which were smuggled into Palestine.

Although the Schulmans wanted to go to Palestine, they were refused entry, and with an infant, illegal immigration was impossible. They applied everywhere and were among the few accepted by Canada.

Their first years in Toronto were discouraging and disappointing. Schulman and her husband, a chartered accountant, found factory work and lived in a room over a butcher shop.

She says the suffering never ends and the memories never leave her. She is grateful to have rebuilt her life and proud of her daughter, a physician, and her son, an orthopedic surgeon.

Schulman has become a recognized artist, continues her photography and devotes her time to speaking to groups of students about the Holocaust. She recently completed a book of her memories of the war.

The captain asked, 'Bis du a Yid?'

Nechemia Wurman:

Nechemia Wurman's fight for survival and for the survival of other Jews ended on the day of his liberation in 1945.

And on that day, he says, his commitment to help build a new life and a new state for the Jewish people began.

Wurman fought what was going on around him during the Holocaust -- as a partisan in the resistance movement in the region of Lublin, Poland. Disguised as a Pole of German descent serving in the German Wehrmacht, he passed vital, secret information to the partisans.

He has recorded these events in his book titled Nechemia. It is a testament to his bravery and to the capacity of the human spirit to survive. It is also a tribute to his German commander, Heinz Klockman, who, knowing Wurman was a Jew, saved his life.

Wurman was 12 when the war broke out. Eight days later his town, Kurow, Poland, was destroyed by German bombers. His family was dispersed and with his father and a sister, he found their way to the Ostroviec ghetto. The ghetto was liquidated and 15,000 Jews were taken to the death camp — 1,000 were taken to a work camp.

Among them were Wurman and his father, who was later taken out of the camp and executed. His mother died in Auschwitz in 1944.

Realizing that all the Jews were doomed, he escaped and joined the resistance only to be betrayed by a Polish informer.

He escaped the German military police and looking for the Russian front, stumbled into the German Army where he posed as a Pole. Assuming the name, Marion Schmidt, he was taken into the German Army's 72nd Infantry Battalion as a cook, and he was able to pass information to the partisans.

He miraculously survived the arrival of the approaching Russians on Jan. 12, 1945. Wearing his German uniform, he was saved by a Russian captain who believed his story that he was a Polish Jew. The captain asked, "Bis du a Yid?" (Are you a Jew?). Given a Russian coat and hat, his fight for survival came to an end.

In a DP camp in Germany following liberation, he formed a summer camp for 200 orphaned children, studied at the Betar school, joined the Irgun (Jewish underground) and became a commander responsible for sending youths and weapons to Palestine. In 1948, he made aliyah, fought in the War of Independence, the Sinai Campaign and the Six Day War.

Decorated by the State of Israel for his bravery in Israel and in the Holocaust, the real estate developer who had Israeli-Canadian business ties, moved to Toronto in 1967 with his wife and three children.

Tears still run down his cheeks 50 years later as he speaks of the loss of most of his family. His two brothers perished in the war; two sisters survived.

"I try to forget," he says, "but the nightmares never go away. I dream that I am running, running. To this day I can't plan anything ahead of time — it may not work out."

Paula Bultz (front row, second from right) with other youngsters at a Displaced Persons camp in Heidenheim, Germany, in 1946.

'It was over for the Russians but not for us.'

Paula Bultz:

Paula Bultz and her mother didn't consider themselves liberated at the end of the war.

"We were displaced persons freed from Siberian labor camps," says Bultz, born in Warsaw in 1935. Her soldier father was killed when she was four, and her mother took her to Asia.

"It was over for the Russians but not for us. I remember being in the park and hearing everyone rejoicing. And I remember getting ice cream."

She recalls her mother saying it was time to go back to Poland, but Bultz was disgusted with the conditions in post-war Poland and disturbed by overt anti-Semitism.

In Krakow, the teenager was confronted when she wandered into a church. Bultz's mother decided to leave town before trouble arose. Tension continued in Lodz, when one of Bultz's father's friends was murdered. Bultz herself was beaten up in school.

In 1946, Bultz and her mother were smuggled from Germany to Sweden before immigrating to Canada in 1951. Her mother remarried and Bultz's family circle grew to include a father and two brothers. She married Joseph Bultz, and the couple have a son, Joshua, and grandchildren.

Bultz volunteers at the Montreal Holocaust Centre twice a week. "I've found guiding tours helps me learn about my roots and my heritage." She also belongs to a group of child survivors of hidden children.

"It's very meaningful."

Contemplating 'liberation'

No one can be liberated from death

By ALAIN GOLDSCHLAGER

On January 27, 1945, Soviet troops liberated Auschwitz, the epitome of Nazi evil. Fifty years later, commemoration of that liberation took place at the camp with flags of many nations, including that of Israel, blowing in the stiff breeze. Former internees including Elie Weisel and Simone Veil were present. President Walesa addressed the "dignitaries". We read about the commemoration of the liberation in headlines and in daily newspaper reporting across the western world. We were invited to reflect on the events.

Unfortunately, the simple sentences of the texts are almost obscene. A cemetery cannot be liberated. Mass graves cannot be liberated. No one can be liberated from death.

What are we challenged to commemorate? Do we cheer the end of oppression? Do we accept a new hope for humanity?

Auschwitz, like the other death camps, ghettos, and killing fields were not prisons of which the doors could suddenly be opened and freedom returned to the internees.

There was no liberation, no freedom from fear and sorrow, for those who survived the horrors. Internees were there because of what they were: Jews. As Jews they entered. As Jews they suffered. And as Jews they died.

Fifty years after the Shoah we are called upon to contemplate its meaning. There are three areas to consider in trying to understand what liberation means: What liberation means for the survivor; what liberation means for the Jewish people; what liberation should mean for all humanity.

The prisoners of the camps and the ghettos were captives of two very real prisons. The first was the external physical prison of walls and electrified barbed wire, of starvation, where names and identities were exiled, where reality was pain and despair, and yet a place where human dignity was to survive for another day.

The second prison is internal. It was made of tortured memories of lost friends and relatives, of profound isolation from personal and social roots, of fear and anguish, and of wounded souls. The doors of that internal prison remained barred. Many are still behind the fences of that prison. They remember the wounds. They remember what was lost. No joy can be absolute for them. Even the happiness in the birth of their own children and grandchildren is tainted by the impossibility of sharing these joys with vanished parents and relatives. Simchas are incomplete for many of them, for they are not complete in some special way. In their own way, they all died in the horrors of the Shoah. The survivor will never be liberated from painful memories, and at night, when they are alone, many of them re-enter their prison.

In the same way, we as Jews, are also captives of the Shoah. All of us, our children, and generations to come are part of the inescapable inheritance. The Shoah is an integral and essential part of our collective memory, and of our personal identity. Auschwitz and Treblinka and Transnistria, and hundreds of other places are burnt into our memory. They are the cemetery of a vast cultural life. Our history is linked to these places.

Nostalgia will never replace meaning: We are all orphans of the Shoah. We cry for our lost past. Our culture was our treasure and the relics are so few and fragile. We cannot be "liberated" from this history, nor do we wish to be, for in doing so we impoverish our souls and the souls of our children. We, our children and our future generations are permanently marked by the Shoah. We can not refuse to assume the legacy.

One great hope continued after the liberation. After the camps and ghettos were opened, after the horrors had ended, a fervent desire remained. This hope, nurtured by the survivors, was that prejudice and hate, based on ethnicity, or religion, or colour had been forever eradicated, that the memory of the camps and ghettos had made anti-Semitism and prejudice impossible.

Auschwitz, and what it symbolizes, remain the embodiment of evil. No good could have come from that place save for our resolve and the world's resolve that this will never again be allowed to happen. Was this hope in vain? Jews were killed for being born Jews: a crime against humanity. Crimes against humanity are being perpetrated now even as you read this essay. As long as these crimes continue, the evil of Auschwitz will continue and liberation will not have happened for Jews or humanity.
